Mr. Speaker, if the Constitution and the Union have been preserved, and the States of the South are in the Union, as I think has been fully proved, then it necessarily follows that the States of the North and of the South are coequals in regard to all the constitutional rights of States in the Union. This is a self-evident proposition, its truth cannot be disputed, because the Constitution knows no difference, it allows no difference, but places all the States on the ground of perfect equality. And for men to attempt to enforce a difference in regard to the admission of members of Congress, or any other right, is to turn revolutionists and trample under foot the Constitution they have sworn to support. In view of the Constitution, what becomes, sir, of all we have heard in these Halls from week to week about guarantees, guarantees, and bonds to keep the peace? The Representatives of part of the States in the Union, with magisterial air turning to other States in the Union and demanding guarantees, dictating the terms upon which they will graciously deign to allow their Representatives seats on this floor, assuming to inquire into the political and moral history of Representatives sent here by States in the Union! If the Representative is found loyal according to their standard, inquire whether the State that sent him is loyal, but if so, then demand guarantees that the State will remain loyal for all time to come. Sir, this is the senseless jargon we have heard here ringing in these Halls until the true friends of the country are weary of it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is always consistent, though, as I think, always wrong in regard to the status of the southern States; still he seldom, if ever, reaches a conclusion at war with his premises. But this is far from being true as to others who act with him. Some weeks ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] favored us with a speech in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The first part of that speech was a successful attack upon the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania "that the southern States were out of the Union, conquered provinces, and subject to the will of Congress." The gentleman from New York established the reverse of that proposition; and he went on to say:

"I regard these States as just as truly within the jurisdiction of the Constitution, and therefore just as really and truly States of the American Union as they were before the war."

In regard to our action or dealings with those States the gentleman said:

"We are to be guided and governed, not simply by our own sovereign will and pleasure as conquerors, but by the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution of the United States, precisely as we are restrained and limited in our dealings with all other States of the American Union."

We listened with great interest and pleasure to these sound constitutional views so ably presented and defended by that gentleman. But it was with pain that we heard the gentleman in the latter part of the same speech declare, that before allowing their Representatives seats in Congress, he would require of these States "certain conditions in the nature of guarantees for the future." They must repudiate their war debt; abandon and renounce the principle of State sovereignty; guaranty the proper treatment of the freedmen; "he would exact of them all needed and all just guarantees for their future loyalty to the Constitution and laws of the United States." And he further said:

"I would exercise a rigid scrutiny into the character and loyalty of the men whom they may send to Congress before I allowed them to participate in the high prerogative of legislating for the nation."

It seems strange that the gentleman from New York, starting out from premises exactly the reverse, should nevertheless be found in his conclusions hand in hand with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, ready to vote and act with him in holding the States of the South "subject to the absolute will and disposal of Congress." Possibly that gentleman, after assaulting and carrying the outer works and strongholds of his adversary, became panic-stricken, and when victory was within his reach surrendered to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It would have been cruelty if the Pennsylvanian had imposed harder terms, for the surrender was unconditional.

Now, sir, it is plain that if Congress can require of a State in the Union any guarantee or any condition not provided for in the Constitution, as the ground upon which the State shall be allowed representation in Congress, then any number or kind of guarantees and conditions may be required; so that the right of the State to representation is made to depend wholly on the sovereign will and pleasure of Congress, and therefore the State may be excluded from representation altogether if Congress shall think proper to do so. Sir, it is seen at a glance that all the guarantees and conditions mentioned by the gentleman from New York are in utter contempt of the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution. No one here would for a moment think of saying to a State of the North, "Give us guarantees that you will remain loyal in future and we will allow your Representatives seats with us, but not otherwise." Such a demand by Congress would be the highest evidence of its own disloyalty to the Constitution, and show it engaged in revolution to overthrow it.

The Constitution defines, limits, and fixes the qualifications of members of Congress. As to this House the Representative must be twenty-five years of age; must have been seven years a citizen of the United States; and when elected an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen. Everything else is left to the judgment and discretion of the people who elect him. If the Representative sent here has the age, citizenship, and residence I have mentioned, then the Constitution declares him qualified. Congress has no power to add to or take from these qualifications. To do so would be to change the Constitution. Congress can judge of but cannot fix or make qualifications. It is plain, therefore, what is meant by that other clause of the Constitution, which says "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Now, when a Representative from a State presents himself here, this House has power under that clause of the Constitution to judge of what, of his character, of his loyalty, of the loyalty of his constituents? No, of none of these; but only whether he has the qualifications fixed by the Constitution as to age, citizenship, and residence, and whether the election and returns are according to law. This is all that is meant by that clause of the Constitution; and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania I say, "It seems amazing that any man of legal education could give it any larger meaning."

Mr. Speaker, when it is earnestly insisted here that the plain provisions of the Constitution should alone control this House in admitting Representatives into this body, whether sent from the South or from the North, the Constitution as to both being the same, gentlemen seem alarmed, and say, "The South may send here men who were leaders in the rebel army." And in holy horror they exclaim, "Are we to take by the hand and welcome to seats here rebels whose hands have been stained with loyal blood?" But in reply it might be asked, "Will you, then, stain your souls with perjury by violating the plain provisions of the Constitution you have sworn to support, and thereby make yourselves as guilty and criminal as you say they are?" But let us not be too much alarmed, but examine the question a moment. There would be more reason to believe gentlemen sincere in the alarm they express if they had not refused seats to Representatives sent here from the South who are men of acknowledged loyalty, men who were in the Union Army and periled their lives in defense of its flag. If the South should send a man here guilty of treason or other high crime, who had neither been tried, punished, nor pardoned, any one of you could have him arrested and sent off for trial, and so avoid his presence. Possibly, sir, a similar case might arise in the North, and what then would be the action of those gentlemen? We all know that for many years before the war there were large numbers in the North of open and avowed disunionists and traitors, laboring from year to year to dissolve the Union. Take a single example. Some time before the war a society of these disunionists met in Boston, Massachusetts, and passed this resolution:

"Resolved, That the one great issue before the country is the dissolution of the Union, in comparison with which all other issues with the slave power are as dust in the balance; therefore we give ourselves to the work of annulling this covenant with death as essential to our own innocence and the speedy and everlasting overthrow of the slave system."

In support of the resolution Wendell Phillips said:

"I entirely accord with the sentiments of that last resolution. I think all we have to do is to prepare the public mind by the daily and hourly presentation of the doctrine of disunion. Events which, fortunately for us, the Government itself and other parties are producing with unexampled rapidity, are our best aid."

And even during the war, Phillips, in a speech in this city, boasted that he had spent nineteen years to take nineteen States out of the Union; and there are many such men in the North.

Now, suppose the people of Massachusetts should elect and send here Wendell Phillips as their Representative, a man who has been steeped in treason for twenty years; and yet who doubts that the very men who are alarmed at the idea of seeing a southern rebel here, would nevertheless take by the hand this great rebel leader of the northern rebellion, and welcome him to a seat by their side in this House? But at the same time their loyal nerves would be shocked if a southern rebel were in the House. How righteous these political saints are; almost as righteous as were the Scribes and Pharisees!

Mr. Speaker, when a Congress like this, representing only part of the country, arrogates to itself the power to ignore the Constitution and fix its own rules for the admission of members from other parts of the country, it is manifest that Congress, and not the people, choose the Representative, because unless he will suit their wishes and strengthen their party the door of Congress is closed against him. There can be no plainer act of revolution to overthrow republican government than this. And yet, sir, that is precisely what has been going on here for more than four months of this session. This body of Representatives from the northern and middle States have, in fact, for the time being, nullified the Constitution and seceded from the other States of the Union; and are now, as to the legislative branch, carrying on a separate government to the exclusion of the other States, based on this act of secession. They have what they call "a reconstruction committee." This committee matures plans and adopts rules for the larger body; it answers all the purposes and more nearly resembles one of the secession conventions of the South than anything else seen in this country since 1861. Sir, was not President Johnson right when he charged, in the Senate in February, 1861, that the abolitionists of the North "were nullifiers and secessionists?" They are now demonstrating the truth of the charge, though acting under another name.

But certain gentlemen say if the Representatives from the South are allowed to come into Congress there is danger that laws may be repealed which they desire to perpetuate, and other measures distasteful to them enacted. Well, suppose it should be so, what do you propose to do about it? You answer, you "intend to provide against it," you "do not intend to submit to it." Then you do not intend to have a government controlled by a majority of the people of the whole country. You intend to establish an oligarchy on the ruins of republican government. You are now seeking to accomplish your purpose by civil revolution, but you are preparing the elements that may bring on a fearful and bloody conflict. Of one thing rest assured: the people of this country will never long submit to a government of any form that does not allow the voice of the whole people to be heard in its management.

Mr. Speaker, the northern rebellion, or disunion party of the North, at every period and under all its assumed names, has been, and now is, substantially the same. Always too busy with the sins of others to repent of its own; always aggressive and intolerant; always moved by a rapacious lust of power; its vital principle of action, its motive power, is native, inbred, political depravity. To gain political power it assumed the garb of philanthropy, shed hypocritical tears over the negro, and struck for the abolition of slavery. Its ceaseless agitation of the slavery question from year to year culminated in a war between the North and the South, the most desolating and sanguinary the world ever saw. Taking advantage of the war thus brought on, it accomplished the abolition of slavery.

And here, sir, passing by that enormous public debt that has doomed the white race to the grinding and oppressive slavery of taxation for generations to come; forgetting the million of brave white men that have fallen and perished in camp and battle-field; passing by their maimed survivors, with the multiplied thousands of widows and orphans that fill and sadden the land; passing by all this, let us pause and consider for a moment what abolitionism has done for the black race. Four million slaves, by nature far inferior to the white race, never accustomed to think or provide for themselves, depending wholly on their masters for homes, support, and protection, a large portion of them aged and infirm men and women and helpless children; all of them are suddenly robbed of food, clothing, home, and protection, and turned out naked, homeless, and penniless to struggle for existence as best they can with a superior and highly cultivated white race. As must have been foreseen by all but blind fanatics, already many thousands of them have perished and died from disease, exposure, cold, and hunger. Thousands more all over the country are now perishing, starving, and dying. Even here in this city, the voice of suffering and hunger appeals to us from all the abolition pens, where hundreds of them are huddled together in rags and fifth, perishing and starving. Only a few days ago you appropriated $25,000 to save from starvation, a few days longer, the miserable inmates of these abolition pens in this city. And you call these wretched victims of your policy "freedmen." And the act by which you placed them in this condition, you call "emancipation." But "the iron pen of history will record it as the most monstrous act of cruelty that ever darkened the annals of any of the nations of the earth." Sir, the country begins to see now that abolitionism and not the Constitution is indeed "a covenant with death" to the negro.

Not content with the ruin they have wrought, these pestilent agitators seize on the fact that slavery is abolished, and make that the basis of a new conflict. They are now everywhere striking for negro equality, warring against the laws of nature, seeking to blot out all distinctions, and crush down the white race to political and social equality with the blacks; all for the purpose of gaining a new recruit of negro voters to aid them in ruling and governing the white people in the South and border States. The natural tendency of this movement will be to engender a bitterness of feeling and burning antagonism between the whites and blacks that may break out in a war of races, resulting in the extermination of the whole remnant of the negro race in this country. But taking for their motto "Better roign in hell than serve in heaven," these mad, restless spirits rush on to another conflict, reckless of all consequences, determined to rule or ruin. Sir, the country will see after awhile, begins to see now, that abolitionism, not slavery, was the "sum of all villainies;" and the poor deluded negro will find too late that his master was his best and kindest friend, and the abolitionist his worst and most cruel enemy.

Mr. Speaker, the rebellion in the South can plead in extenuation much provocation long and patiently borne, but the northern rebellion can urge no such plea. Radicalism in the North was the source and origin of all the terrible convulsions and bloody horrors this country has suffered. The South, with all its errors, made no aggressions on the rights of the North. It never intermeddled with, nor sought to control, the domestic institutions of the States in the North. The South claimed only to exercise that control over its own domestic affairs it freely conceded to the North, and which was secured to both by a common Constitution. But the radicals of the North, without the hope of benefiting that section, and with no temptation save the gratification of a fallen, depraved, and malignant spirit, denounced the Constitution as "a league with death and a covenant with hell," and made lawless and unprovoked aggressions from year to year on the constitutional rights of the South. This led to the formation of two bitter sectional parties, one in the North and one in the South. And, as foretold by the Father of his Country, these sectional parties soon brought on a horrid conflict that reddened the land with kindred blood, and blasted the country with desolation, as if smitten by the lightnings of heaven.

"By their fruits you shall know them." Radicalism in the North sowed and cultivated the seed, and the fruit was a harvest of blood. To conceal its horrid visage, radicalism put on the robe of philanthropy, and four millions of the black race are robbed of home and protection, and doomed to extermination, while the whole race of free white laborers throughout the whole country are sold into the galling slavery of taxation, cut off even from the hope that their children after them will be emancipated. Thus has the sun-dial of prosperity and happiness of this great country been set back half a century. And now, sir, the same party, under another name, and with the cry of liberty on its tongue, is earnestly striving to subvert the foundations of republican government, laboring to centralize, consolidate, and build up a frightful Federal despotism, under whose dark and deadly shadow self-government and all State rights would utterly sink and perish.

Sir, the people have been too long deceived by the hypocritical professions and fair names assumed by the northern disunionists. They should remember that under the mask of the best names the worst crimes have been committed. In the name of "liberty and equality" France was deluged in blood, while all law and all liberty lay prostrate beneath the iron tread of tyranny. And in other days, in the outraged name of religion, martyr fires were kindled, and men "of whom the world was not worthy" consumed at the stake.

Sir, the times are alarming. The horizon is full of dark and ominous clouds. Let the true friends of the country, of every name, unite with the Democratic hosts of the North, rally around and sustain the President in his patriotic and noble stand for the liberty of the people; and the northern rebellion will be crushed and subdued, our blood-bought heritage of constitutional liberty wrested from its deadly grasp, and the Constitution with the Union restored and preserved.

THE NATION AND ITS LABOR.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the duty the Government owes to the Labor of the country, I do not wish to be understood as seeking to avoid the consideration of other duties that devolve upon this Congress, in connection with the restoration of the national authority over the lately rebellious States. These latter are of the highest magnitude. None higher have ever devolved upon any body of legislators; and none of equal importance have rested upon an American Congress since the close of the session of the body which placed the Government in operation. The patience and patriotism, the wisdom and prudence, the skill and courage of those fathers of the Republic have been vindicated in the growth, glory, and strength of the nation. An equal need of praise will be ours if, like them, we do our duty faithfully, wisely, and well.

To this end we want not haste. On the other hand, cautious watchfulness should precede every step. We want not rashness. On the other hand, the most thorough self-possession should guaranty the soundness of every link of policy. We want not cowardice. On the other hand, a manly courage should impel us to see our dangers and should nerve us to meet and surmount them. On these points I have very few theories. I do not distract myself over the many perplexing suggestions which this great debate has elicited on every hand. To me it is comparatively unimportant which line of argument may ultimately be established. I content myself with knowing that the rebellion has been triumphantly suppressed, that the flag of the Union has been vindicated, and that the nation is not to be severed. I know, further, that it is a duty we owe both to the dead and the living to require from those whom we have overcome on the bloody fields of battle some guarantees for the future. If we do not demand indemnity for the past we must have security for the future. Those lately in rebellion are now clamorous to become again a part of the governing power of the nation; to help mold our policy; to help enact our laws. Five years since they scornfully abdicated the seats they held in these high places, and insulted us who remained true to our allegiance with declarations of a purpose never again to share with us in a common Government. They left of their own will and against ours. They must return in accordance with our will and upon our terms. The victory won by our brave soldiers and sailors must bear its fruits, and the vanquished must relinquish all the causes of the war. They must not only abandon slavery, but the principle of slavery, and must secure the rights of freemen to all the freedmen within their borders. This is the natural and inevitable result of the war, and from it there is no escape. They must repudiate the rebel debt, renounce the claimed right of secession, and be willing to accept as the true theory of our Constitution that which the war has settled in conformity with the purposes of its framers. They must cultivate a spirit of loyalty to the Union, and prove it by their works. To do less is but to mock the nation's heroes who fought and died for us.

This much I am prepared to require, and I know in doing so I will be carrying out the views of the constituency who sent me here, and who in disaster and danger never wearied of showing how tenderly their hearts and how closely their fortunes were intertwined with the destinies of the Republic.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

This war has entailed upon us a debt of nearly three thousand million dollars, with an annually accruing interest of at least one hundred and fifty millions. This is a sacred obligation. It is due chiefly to our own citizens, who, with a spontaneous liberality beyond all example, opened their coffers at the invitation of their Government in its hours of darkness and distress. No honest man will countenance the thought of repudiation in whole or in part. The debt must be paid to the last dollar. It will be so paid, and one more will thus be added to the long list of unfulfilled prophecies which croakers during the war spread throughout the land.

But the payment of the interest, the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government, and the creation of a fund for the gradual extinction of the debt, involves a system of taxation which, in all its ramifications, opens a wide field for the exercise of the highest qualities of statesmanship, the great purpose being to harmonize this duty with the development of the resources of the country, the encouragement of its labor, and the improvement of the condition of the people.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC BURDENS AND THE NECESSITY OF PROTECTION.

Some advantages lighten this task. The enormous extent of our soil, embracing every variety of climate and production, the fertility of the land, its wealth of timber and minerals, its abundant water-power, its facilities of intercommunication by rail and river, and the substantial homogeneity of the people are elements of great consequence; and their coexistence will enable us, by diffusing the public burdens among our vast and varied interests, to make them rest lightly on every one. One thing, however, is indispensable, namely, that we have the amount of labor necessary to reach these resources, combine them into products, and form within ourselves the chain of production and consumption which, in its inevitable and constant round, casts its blessings upon all classes and pursuits.

Europe is sending us the bone and muscle of her population. Emigration is adding almost incalculably to our wealth. Each season we receive not less than one hundred thousand hale and hearty emigrants, worth more to us, in my opinion, than the importation of $100,000,000 in gold. Each laborer, as he digs in the mines, or works in the mills, at the furnace, the plow, the loom, the anvil, adds to the nation's wealth by increasing the market value of the article upon which he is engaged or preparing for production from the soil. This labor at once becomes part of the nation's capital, and enters into the computation of the nation's revenue.

The more constant its employment the more constant and important its results. If unexercised, it is lost forever, both to the laborer and to the nation. Thus the interest of every part of the people is the interest of the whole; and the duty of the laborer to work has its counterpart in the duty of the nation to help him work. The two are interdependent. The man cannot maintain himself without it. The State cannot be prosperous unless its "bone and sinew" be employed and prosperous. So we find the unanswerable argument for protection in the very necessities of our nature, which we dare not disregard, and which we must respect if we would live and thrive.

INTERFERENCE OF FOREIGN INTERESTS.

Interested parties seek to drive the American Congress from the discharge of this plain duty to its people; and, as formerly, the impulse now comes "from over the water." I have just received, Mr. Speaker, from a constituent, this circular, which has been extensively distributed throughout the western States, I learn. It is so instructive upon this point that I insert it entire:

NEW YORK, March 19, 1866.

DEAR SIR: We the undersigned iron merchants in New York, representing, we believe, the entire foreign trade in railroad iron, and also a portion of that of our own country, beg respectfully, but earnestly, to call your attention to the efforts being made by the iron-masters of Pennsylvania, through their Representatives in Congress, to procure an addition to the already excessive duty on rails. With the cost of freight, insurance, and incidental charges added to the present duty, there is a discrimination of at least seventy per cent. upon the manufacturers' price of rails in favor of the American iron-master. It strikes us this should be quite enough to secure him a profit. But it does appear strange that with a decline in gold, labor, and the cost of living, an attempt should be made, aided by a political money influence, so powerful as to warrant a fair chance of success, to advance the price of rails, under the name of protection to home industry, to a price which would prevent the development of new enterprises and materially interfere with the repairs and reconstruction of the railroads of the South and West. It would appear as if the entire railroad, commercial, and agricultural interests of the country were to give way to the advancement of the one interest in Pennsylvania, which has under the present tariff increased its capacity for production so considerably, and yet claims legislation to almost make its business a monopoly. We commend this matter to your careful consideration, and beg that you will use your influence with your Representative in Congress, and endeavor to give them full information on this subject, and ask them which will produce the most revenue to the Government, one mile of railroad, or the duty on one ton of rails.

ANSWERS TO THE CIRCULAR.

The gentlemen who signed and sent out this circular frankly state that they represent the entire foreign trade in railroad iron. No person, then, need be mistaken as to the objects they propose. They desire to build up the foreign iron trade, out of which they live, and to break down the domestic iron trade, by which thousands of American working-men earn their bread and maintain their families.

They charge that a "political money influence" is at work to achieve protection to home interests. It is upon the records of the nation that the last victory of the foreign trade, won in 1846, was with the aid of British gold, and it is at least as probable that the same interests are now using the same means as that those in the home trade are. I make no charge, for I have no facts, but it is mere impertinence in these foreign agents to attempt to cast an imputation in view of the ascertained expenditure made by their own friends in the memorable contest which resulted in the passage of the free-trade tariff of 1846.

They charge, further, that with the cost of freight, insurance, and incidental charges added to the present duty, there is a discrimination of at least seventy per cent. upon the manufacturers' price of rails in favor of the American manufacturer. This can be easily refuted. The foreign rail bears no share of the indirect burdens levied by Government, and pays only the import duty. The English and Welsh iron-workers receive at this time an average of about fifty cents per day, making the net cost of a ton of rails about twenty dollars. The net cost of a ton of rails may be fairly computed at forty days' labor. Including the miner, mill-men, mechanic, clerk, and manager, the average rate of wages paid to men engaged in this country is two dollars per day, making the cost of the rails eighty dollars per ton. Four fifths of this are expended in living as soon as earned. On which the subjoined calculation, which has been verified and may be accepted as substantially correct, shows the amount of tax received by Government, which, be it remembered, receives nothing of this upon the foreign rail:

This calculation has been, I have said, made with care, and I believe it to be mainly correct. How different, then, is the relation of the foreign and domestic manufacturers from that stated by the gentlemen who represent the foreign trade of the country.

See, besides, the incidental benefit derived from the presence in this country, rather than in Great Britain, of manufacturing establishments. The Cambria Iron-Works at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, paid their employees, in 1864, the enormous sum of $1,399,899 82; and in 1865, the still larger sum of $1,535,380 24. The population maintained by this establishment consumes annually, 2,000 head of beef cattle, 3,000 head of sheep, the product of not less than 4,000 hogs, and 20,000 barrels of wheat flour from the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and other parts of the great Northwest.

An iron-works, to produce from the ore 10,000 tons per annum, employs the labor of 1,300 men, which supports a population of 6,500 of all ages and both sexes, who, by the ascertained rate of political economists, consume fifty dollars per head in agricultural products. The rail-mills of the country in 1865 produced 353,017 tons. If we make the liberal deduction of 123,015 tons for rails rerolled, and throw all the labor employed in rerolling out of the calculation, we have 230,000 tons as the amount of production, sustaining a population of 150,000, who consume annually in farm products alone, $7,475,000. This is the special branch of the iron business which the "foreign trade in railroad iron" desire Congress to sacrifice for their benefit, on the pretext, also, that a few hundred miles of railroad, to be constructed this year or the next, may be spared from borrowing a thousand dollars or so more per mile than might be required if they succeed in their design of destroying it.

But the circular seeks to create a jealousy by alleging that it is the manufacturers of Pennsylvania who are making this effort. Why single out the Keystone State for special mention? In 1865, the total production of railroad iron in the United States was 353,017 tons, of which 189,123, or more than one half, were made in other States; and of the thirty-seven mills in the United States, about two thirds are in other States than Pennsylvania, as appears from the following table:

Pennsylvania contains but a portion of the great bituminous coal-fields of the Union. She has less than Illinois or Ohio, and not more than several others of the States; and New York, Michigan, Missouri, Tennessee, and Virginia have each of them more, and some of them far better, iron ore than Pennsylvania. Maryland, New Jersey, North Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Arkansas, and probably Alabama, have excellent ores, and either coal or wood on the spot, or easily accessible for all future requirements. The same fact is stated of Utah and Montana, and is probably true of other Territories. In the face of the truth, then, that eleven States besides Pennsylvania are already manufacturing railroad iron, and at least six others, beside the Territories, have within them the leading materials in abundance for its manufacture, the assumption of the circular that this is solely a Pennsylvania interest, as against the rest of the country, is simply absurd.

How strongly the true interests of some of the western and southern States are linked to this iron question may be further indicated. Some of them have resources in iron superior to Pennsylvania, or to all those at the command of Great Britain. Some of the largest iron-works in western Pennsylvania transport the ore from which their product is made from northern Michigan and southern Missouri. A rail-mill in Pittsburg gets its ore from Lake Superior. One of the largest mills in the State, as I have been told by its proprietors, is only awaiting transportation facilities to follow the example. At least two of those in Ohio procure their ores from the same source. Every dollar's worth of ore raised from the mines of Michigan, Missouri, or Tennessee, is a dollar created, and eighty or ninety per cent. of every dollar thus created is distributed to those who delve in the mines, or work in the mills, and through them to the farmers who feed them, and the mechanics or laborers in a hundred other branches of industry who contribute to their necessities or comforts. Every dollar so created, and its multiples resulting from the labor of perfecting the raw material, is an addition to the wealth of the nation. Buy your iron from abroad, and you not only lose that profit which would otherwise have been produced, but every dollar you pay, save only the small percentage of tariff and the agent's commission, is carried off to be expended in a foreign land.

What has been said of railroad iron applies with equal force to all kinds of iron manufacture, whether cast, rolled, or hammered; and especially to those finer kinds upon which the greatest amount of labor is expended, and which, by reason of the comparative cheapness of European labor, the foreign maker has, at all times and under all rates of duties, been able to send to American markets. And the principle which I wish to enforce is not confined to iron, but to American manufactures in all their branches, every one of which is entitled to as much care from the Government as is required for its safe, steady, and successful development.

BENEFITS OF PROTECTION.

The benefits which flow from protection are not confined to Pennsylvania, and will be as wide-spread as our boundaries. Iron and coal are found in great abundance in many of the western States, and already a large quantity of iron is manufactured in West Virginia, Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and other States; and the day is not distant when the fertile Northwest, so productive of the cereals, will become the great manufacturing center of the Union. The earlier settlement of Pennsylvania, and the local advantages she enjoyed, have given her a start which, I hope, will enable her to maintain a healthy competition there many years for the trade of the West and South; but as population increases and the wants of the country are developed capital will seek promising locations and find new mines of ore and coal in the search for the minimum cost of production. Michigan ore will then be turned into bars, rods, and nails on Michigan soil, and the prairies of the West will be dotted with the chimney stacks of furnaces and forges, and ring with the cheerful sound of many-handed labor. The same causes will secure for the West a division of the manufacture of textile fabrics, which are now nearly monopolized by the eastern States, and the blessings of diversified production will thus be gradually extended over every portion of the country, until, with enlarged capital economically employed, improved machinery, diminished risks and costs of transportation, the minimum cost of production will be reached, and the nation be secure in its commercial supremacy.

This is within our grasp, and it is for the legislators of this day to say whether we shall reach this position and enjoy the advantages to be reaped from it, or whether we are to continue to play a part subordinate to a people to whom there is no reason why we should pay tribute; who are the enemies of our institutions and the scoffers at our principles; who were our enemies in the day of our weakness, and are our inferiors in every element of greatness except in the aggregation of capital which has enabled them to crush feeble nations, which has enabled them at times to corrupt the legislation of stronger, and before whom I insist it is our duty to maintain a determined and inflexible front.

THE STEEL QUESTION.

The history of the manufacture of steel in this country is of itself an argument. It is but a few years since it was commenced here. In 1864 there were thirty-seven establishments, of which fourteen were in Pennsylvania, nine in New York, five in Massachusetts, five in New Jersey, two in Connecticut, one in Michigan, and one in Illinois. The manufacture is one of great value, as its products cover the whole range of mechanics' tools and agricultural implements, as well as the implements of war. Its manufacture requires the highest class of skilled labor, and the pioneers in the experiment were obliged to pay large wages and even bounties to tempt skilled European workmen to incur the expense of coming here, and to pay them during the time thus occupied, each of which items was an addition to the disadvantages under which the attempt was made, although experience has proved that we have in this country, and especially in Essex county, New York, ore from which steel is manufactured of a quality equal to the best foreign-made article.

The tariff duties have been less favorable than was required. Prior to the passage of the Morrill tariff of 1861, the duty was only twelve per cent., less than half the amount then charged on iron. In that act it has been about doubled, but it is graded according to appraised value. That valued at seven cents per pound or less pays two and a quarter cents per pound; valued at seven and not over eleven cents per pound, three cents per pound; valued at over eleven cents per pound, three and a half cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem.

During the year 1864, of the importations of steel at the port of Philadelphia, 2,071,060 pounds were valued at less than seven cents; 1,093,507 pounds were valued at over seven and less than eleven cents; and 22,084 pounds were valued at over eleven cents.

During the year ending June 30, 1864, at New York, 14,808,828 pounds were imported valued at less than seven cents; 11,057,947 pounds valued at over seven and less than eleven cents; and 2,698,093 pounds over eleven cents.

During the same period the internal revenue assessor of the twenty-second district, Pennsylvania, which I represent, collected this excise tax from manufactures of steel:

	Tax.
On steel valued at 7 cents or less.....	none.
On steel valued at over 7 and not over 11 cents, 618,147 pounds.....	$3,693 22
On steel valued at over 11 cents, 10,614,313.....	70,908 80
	<hr/> $74,597 02

These figures show:

1. That the American manufacturer pays excise tax upon the full market value.
2. The foreign manufacturer pays on a foreign valuation, imports to his own agent on invoices which are not sale prices, and as a matter of fact manages to get one half of the entire importation of steel through the custom-house at the lowest rate of duty, and the result is, the amount of excise tax paid by the home manufacturer is about equal to the entire duty paid on the imported article, as appears from this detailed statement of the steel manufacturers:

"The following is intended to show the revenue of Government upon each ton of rolled or hammered cast steel made in the United States, under the law as it now stands, namely:
Excise per ton on rolled or hammered steel.....	$15 00
" " " of blooms used in making steel.....	3 60
" " " bar iron.....	3 60
" " on cost of crucibles consumed.....	3 00
" " 10 tons coal.....	60
" " cast iron molds, castings for repairs, fire brick, oil, &c., used in making one ton of steel is.....	60
The cost of stamps on letters, checks, bills lad- ing, &c.....	60
The indirect tax on labor on same basis as that estimated by D. J. Morrell, Esq., at the Cambria Iron-Works, on average value of cast steel, six per cent., inclusive of income tax.....	23 00
	<hr/> $50 00

"From which it appears that the direct and indirect tax paid by the American manufacturer upon every pound of cast steel produced by him, amounts to two and a half cents.

Now, for the sake of comparison, take the official returns of steel imported into New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, giving the quantity under each of the several classifications, and it will be seen that the whole quantity of imported steel amounted to 31,296,043 pounds, which at the present rate of duty will amount to $870,030 38, or two and seventy-eight hundredths cents per pound duty, being about one fourth of a cent per pound more duty than the American manufacturer pays in the shape of excise on his production."

As a consequence the steel trade of America is in great peril, and unless aided by friendly legislation it must perish under the double competition of powerful British corporations or combined capital employing low-priced labor, and of fraudulent evasions of our custom-house duties. The Committee of Ways and Means propose to exempt this manufacture from all direct internal tax; the indirect tax will of course remain. This is a step in the right direction, and will to a considerable extent afford relief; but this important branch will require an increase of duty upon the foreign article to enable it to withstand the effort now being made to crush it out, and to recover the entire trade to the foreign manufacturer.

It is certain that this new and important manufacture is entitled by sympathy, by interest, and in justice, to positive and sufficient protection.

THE GLASS INTEREST.

Like steel, the glass interest is an important one in my district, and what is true of all other branches of manufacture is true of it. The cost of production has more than doubled since 1860. I take these figures from one of the heaviest flint-glass manufacturers in the United States:

	Cost in 1860.
Lead.....	289,277 lbs, 5 1/2 cts....$16,271 83
Ashes.....	214,930 lbs, 5 1/2 cts.... 11,821 15
Niter.....	33,514 lbs, 9 cts.... 3,016 26
Fuel.....	144,000 bu., 4 1/2 cts.... 6,840 00
Boards.....	342,263 ft., $9 50..... 3,251 50
Labor.....	33,711 70
Total.....	<hr/> $74,912 44
	Cost in 1865.
Lead.....	289,277 lbs, 12 cts....$34,713 24
Ashes.....	214,930 lbs, 12 cts.... 25,791 60
Niter.....	33,514 lbs, 15 cts.... 5,027 10
Fuel.....	144,000 bu., 12 cts.... 17,280 00
Boards.....	342,263 ft., $25..... 8,556 58
Labor.....	67,422 14
Total.....	<hr/> $158,790 06

This is exclusive of the internal revenue tax, which nearly equals the tariff on the imported article. These figures show the circumstances under which existing competition is maintained.

Respecting soda ash, included in the above table, it may be well to state that it was extensively manufactured in 1852, 1853, and 1854 in this country, and was sold as low as $2 60 per hundred pounds. It supplied in a great measure the American market, and drove out the foreign article. The foreign makers then combined, put down the price in this market to so low a figure as to break down the American manufacture, and at this moment none is made in this country. The price has been raised to four and a half to five cents per pound in gold in England, and it costs the American manufacturer, in many instances, twelve cents per pound in currency delivered at the factory. The result of the failure properly to protect it is, that the American maker has been broken down and the cost of the article has been more than doubled to the glass manufacturer who requires it in his business, thereby necessarily increasing the cost of glass to all consumers.

During the war, the premium on gold acted as an increase of duty, but as the premium has declined, of course that temporary advantage has declined with it, and will shortly pass away entirely.

As a consequence it is not surprising that the imports are rapidly increasing. For some weeks past they have averaged about eight million dollars per week; and last week they exceeded twelve millions. The exports are about half the former sum. This is a state of facts well calculated to alarm and startle us. The surplus productions of foreign manufacturers are thrown into our ports at low prices, disturbing our values and ruining our manufacturers.

I recently proposed a temporary increase of duties of fifty per cent. until the tariff bill can be prepared and passed, for the purpose of checking this excess of importation, but the House appeared to prefer awaiting the new bill for which the country is languishing.

Some persons object to an increase of duties because a return to specie payments will effect a reduction in the rates of labor and the value of materials. This expectation can be realized only measurably. I hope it will not to the extent desired by many. I should be unwilling to see labor reduced to its former minimum. Under our system it is not the policy of the Government to repress the laborer as in Europe; and we must legislate in the consciousness that the laborers of the country are a power in it. Their interests must be respected; and they are entitled to such legislation as will tend to keep open to them the avenues to thrift, wealth, and power.

They who expect to build up a system which is aimed at the dignity and prosperity of the laborers of the nation, and which necessarily involves their depression to the level of the European standard, should know, what they will soon be taught, that the inspiration of their system is from abroad, is not congenial to our institutions, and should find no lodgment on the statute-books of the great Republic.

THE WOOL INTEREST.

There is another interest of great importance to which I have not alluded, and which deserves candid and just consideration. It is the wool interest, in which eastern, middle, and western States are like concerned. As a branch of industry it is among the most valuable to the nation, both as to its agricultural and its manufacturing capabilities. The product is an absolute necessary of life, for which there can be no adequate substitute. It is capable of the largest variety of domestic and personal uses. Its production and its manufacture employ large numbers of persons, and the profits growing out of it are distributed among different classes and pursuits. Its agency in increasing personal and national wealth is direct and valuable, and in every aspect it deserves to be fostered and protected by the Government.

During the ten years ending in 1860 the aggregate value of the imports of woolen goods into the country was $282,682,880. During the same time, we imported $30,428,157 worth of wool, being an increase of nearly two hundred per cent. over the imports between 1840 and 1860. Our climate and soil enable us to produce wool of every description equal to any country in the world; and it is for the Congress of the nation to say whether, by wise legislation, we shall encourage so profitable and important a production, and whether we shall claim for ourselves the blessings and benefits which will result from the increased manufacture of flannels, cassimeres, shawls, delaines, and the like from American wool. As for myself, I prefer the interest of the American farmer, the American wool-grower, the American manufacturer, the American dealer to the like classes elsewhere; and I am anxious to add to our already numerous sources of wealth that which, in a peculiar manner, appeals to the generous pride and the honorable ambition of every true-hearted American citizen. Petitions by thousands of signers are before Congress beseeching us to be fair to this most meritorious class and thus just to all; and I trust we will not rise until we help to put their business upon such a foundation as will give them hope of ultimate triumph in their effort to expand the sweep and deepen the current of American industry and production.

POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Sir, I know the strength of the prejudices which have been created against the policy of protection; but they will not bear the light of truth. As a policy it has always been an enriching one to the whole people. The country has never been as prosperous as when the Government acted upon it. And the periods of weakness and collapse have always been those in which misrule exposed us to the miseries of free-trade fallacies, which afflicted alike the producer, the manufacturer, the trader, and the Government.

I say the Government has never been rich except under the policy of protection. It has never been strong internally except when it recognized as its first duty that it owes to its own. Take for proof this table:

	Imports.	Revenue.	Average duty.
1845.....	$117,254,564	$27,528,113	23½ per cent.
1856.....	314,639,942	64,022,863	21½ "
1860.....	362,163,941	53,187,512	15 "
1864.....	205,000,009	86,100,000	43 "

These figures show that in 1864, when the average duties were forty-three per cent., we had over one half more revenue than in 1860 when the average was but fifteen per cent.; and that attending this was the important advantage that in the latter period we imported but little over one half the amount in the former; protection thus operating to prevent the evils of excessive importation, to develop our own labor, and to maintain the credit and financial strength of the national Government.

EXPERIENCE OF ENGLAND.

What is our experience in this respect is the experience of other Governments, and especially of that of England, whose remarkable record on this question is worthy of study. In 1846 England formally abandoned the policy of protection, and insisted that if under its previous legislation they prospered it was not owing to protection, but in spite of it. Let us see what has resulted from the change.

In 1820 England's exports of cotton piece goods amounted to 248,370,630 yards; in 1840 to 790,631,997 yards, being an increase in twenty years of 542,261,367 yards, equal to two hundred and thirty-four per cent. In 1860 her exports of cotton piece goods amounted to 2,765,337,818 yards, being an increase in twenty years of 1,974,705,821 yards, equal to two hundred and forty-nine per cent.

The increase of the free-trade period over the severely protective one in the exports of cotton was only fifteen per cent.; but if the respective capabilities of expansion are justly considered, it ought to have been a hundred per cent. at least. The increase of American manufactures from 1840 to 1850 was three hundred and thirty per cent.; and from 1850 to 1860 eighty per cent.

But the greatest and most important of all her products show more than this. Her production of pig iron in 1823 was 452,066 tons; in 1840, 1,396,400 tons—an increase under the protective system of two hundred and nine per cent. In 1857 the production was 3,657,447 tons—an increase of only one hundred and sixty-two per cent. The duty upon pig iron for the first three years of the first of these periods was 17s. 6d. per ton, and ten shillings for the first six years of the last, and free of duty for eleven years, or from 1846 to 1857. The latter period had the supposed advantage, and yet fell forty-seven per cent. short of equaling the protected period in ratio of progress.

Again: the exports of silk manufactures of the twenty years, from 1820 to 1840, increased one hundred and thirteen per cent. in value, while their increase from 1840 to 1860 reached no more than one hundred per cent.

The exports of flax manufactures fared worse; they rose in quantity of yards one hundred and forty-four per cent. from 1820 to 1840, and only reach fifty-five per cent. in 1860 above their amount in 1848.

In woollens, so long encouraged by sumptuary laws, and protected by fines, forfeitures, and even imprisonment, and after these were mitigated to a general average of fifty per cent. duty on all imports, England has lost her supremacy, not indeed by any change in her commercial policy, but by the superiority of the fabrics of the Continent. In 1815 she exported 889,338 pieces of cloth; in 1860 but 670,671. Her home-grown wool has for a long period deteriorated in quality, and she is now to a great extent dependent upon foreign wool and foreign looms for the finer fabrics required for home consumption, as is shown by the constantly declining proportion of the foreign wools imported. Between the years 1820 and 1840 the increase of her imports of wool was one hundred and ninety-seven per cent.; in the next period the increase fell off to one hundred and thirty-seven per cent.

Her exports of worsteds increased in the former period sixty-nine per cent. in the latter but fifty-two per cent. In those of mixed stuffs and flannels there has been some compensation in an increased value amounting to one hundred and forty per cent. as against thirty-three per cent.

In her cutlery, also, she is retrograding, a fact which is by her own authors attributed to the demoralization in her manufacture of those articles. In her endeavor to command the markets of all the savage and semi-civilized regions of the globe, her manufacturers find their account in making goods rather for sale than use; especially in those tools and implements of which every workman is a competent judge. German and American articles are at a premium even in her home market.

The purpose of this detailed array of the results of the respective periods of England's manufacturing history for the twenty years next preceding and next following the date of her change from protection to free trade is to show that the boasted triumph of the latter policy is as false in fact as it is in theory. The advocates of the modern theory appeal to facts and figures, which have a plausible appearance, but the meaning and value of those facts and figures flatly contradict the inferences so confidently drawn from them. The rate of progress in British industry and foreign trade in the years which have gone by since the policy of protection was abandoned has not exceeded, but has actually fallen behind, the rate of progress of any equal period of years previous to the change. The simple truth is, that for more than five centuries British policy defended her productive enterprises, as well as her commerce, against all competition by whatever severity of import duties and discriminative rates which seemed necessary, and having by this means fought her way into such perfection and power as she is capable of, and having nothing more to gain by the policy which made her what she is, she abandons it and decries its policy, utility, and necessity, and uses every agency which she can command to dissuade the nations whom she would hold in industrial vassalage from adopting in their own defense the very system that has made her fortunes. Her business is manufacturing; her progress depends upon it; she must extend it, and her manufactures for foreign use include opinions as well as commodities; she must have foreign markets, and these she cannot have if foreign nations will do their own work and defend their domestic industry as determinedly as they defend their territory against foreign invasion.

Six hundred years ago, in 1331, England commenced her system of protection in the form of absolute protection of the export of her own wool, then the best and most abundant in Europe, and of the import of cloth, of which till then Flanders had the monopoly in European commerce; and she continued the system, under many modifications adapted to the exigencies of her manufacturing history, at every change increasing the efficiency of her tariff, until it culminated in 1819 in an average protection of fifty per cent. on all articles competing with her staple products except manufactures of leather, printed cottons, and earthenware, which carried seventy-five per cent.; bar iron, fifty-seven and three quarters per cent.; plain white cottons, sixty-seven per cent.; and silk manufactures, embroidery, and leather gloves, in which France had the mastery so decidedly that they were met by total prohibition. This policy of centuries was never relaxed, though the atrocious severity of its penalties was gradually abated, until all its objects were fully accomplished; and only after the edifice of her industrial system was finished from foundation to cap-stone she took down the scaffolding on which it was built and called it lumber and rubbish. In 1824 cottons woven in Asia, Persia, China, and the East Indies were still prohibited. In 1730, when the cotton manufacture was commenced in England, the oriental fabrics could be afforded for one third the price of the British product. In 1769 Arkwright invented his spinning machinery, soon afterward improved so that one hand in England could do the work of three thousand in Asia, yet no relaxation was indulged until the price of cotton yarn was reduced from thirty-eight shillings in 1786 to three shillings in 1832 per pound. Silk goods were charged with twenty-five to forty per cent. by their tariff of 1834, and woollens from fifteen to twenty.

From 1819 to 1826 the duty upon foreign bar iron was £6 10s., or $32 50 per ton; but it was in that year reduced to £1 10s., or $7 50. Why? Simply because protection had done its work. Iron was produced at Cardiff the year before at £10 per ton, while in Sweden and Russia it cost £13 13s., in Belgium £16 14s., and in France £24 10s. For ten years before this reduction in the rate of duty England imported of foreign iron an amount equal to ten and a half per cent. of her exports; in the succeeding ten years ten and a quarter per cent., so that her tariff was a dead letter long before its repeal. Her policy in all its stages and apparent changes is a copy of her procedure in relation to iron; never abated, never varied, but to accomplish its object the better, and finally abandoned only when it had fully achieved its utmost possible service in a complete success.

The history of French commercial policy is but the fellow of the British in the earlier stages of industrial development, but something wiser and better in its latest phase. The protective system, introduced by Colbert in 1660, maintained the finances of the kingdom and the progress of her manufactures against the vast expenditure of the fifty-five latter years of the reign of Louis XIV, (1643 to 1715—seventy-two years.) And of a much later period we have the history in the words of J. B. Say. He says:

"For thirty years (1804 to 1834) nearly every law passed on custom-house matters has been intended either to establish or to consolidate the system of protection and prohibition."

The result, as stated by the same author, was that France in 1826 contained the most beautiful manufactures of silk and woollen goods in the world, and he distinctly attributes this success, notwithstanding his free-trade principles, to the policy of Colbert. But after the example of England, France also could afford to remit duties when prohibition and protection had accomplished all their uses. In the treaty of commerce made in 1860, commonly called the Cobden treaty, and proclaimed as a triumph of the free-trade policy by all its advocates in England and among ourselves, silk was made free in the ports of France; and the finer kinds of glass, porcelain, embroideries, and other fabrics in which she excels all other nations, were also exposed to a competition in her home markets, as iron and the coarser cottons are in England; because no successful rivalry in price or product can possibly be effected. Just as free, and for the same reason, as ice at Boston, ivory in Africa, and sealskins among the Esquimaux.

But let the declaration be remarked, and challenged, too, by whomsoever will venture the question, in all things and every item of those commodities wherein her domestic industry could be endangered by Great Britain, the duties agreed upon are as highly protective, as in our Morrill tariff. For instance, on the coarser cottons of England, that treaty imposes two cents per square yard, and on the finest, but one fourth of one cent; on pig, broken and old iron, from $4 39 to $6 35, but on iron manufactures, as follows: railroad $13 68; sheet iron, $25 41 to $31 46; heavy wrought manufactures, $17 58; small ware, $29 32; anchors, chains, cables, $19 54; and wrought tubes, large, $25 40; small, $48 85, per ton; while clocks and watches are let in at five per cent., and clock movements at nine cents per pound, just because they cannot come in at that rate or at any rate.

Now for the results.

The treaty went into operation in 1861. In that year the total exports to France were £17,427,413, and the imports from France £17,826,646—nearly equal. In 1864 the exports were £23,825,392, and the imports had risen to £25,640,733. Here there is no gain even in gross amount to the free-trade operators as against the protective party in the business. But when we come to look at the kind of exports which England sends to France we find that £11,839,517 worth of raw silk, raw cotton, and raw wool made up quite the half of these exports in 1864; how much more of her colonial produce entered into the total may be inferred from the fact that only £8,200,700 of British produce was embraced in the total, leaving full fifteen and a half millions or within a trifle of two thirds of the whole, of which England was only the carrier, and received only the profits or wages of commerce, and nothing of those of manufacturing industry; carrying, among other raw materials, raw silk to the value of £3,545,919, and taking back in exchange £5,980,814 worth of silk manufactures.

Verily this much-trumpeted triumph of England over the protective system of France, and the glorification of Mr. Cobden therefor, looks now as if England was only deceived, and her champion and agent had been outwitted by Louis Napoleon. But other noteworthy results have followed and are still to come. The Liverpool European Times, of the 23d of December last, speaking of the manifold benefits of the Cobden treaty to France, says:

"Some time since the English locomotive was a sort of ideal; whereas at the present day French locomotives are brought to such a degree of perfection as to be ordered from France for English railroads. In like manner the English machinery for extracting coal from mines was justly regarded as the best in the world. Yet not long ago a machine was ordered from a French house in the department of the Nord for an English mine."

Here we see that French protection, equal in amount but threefold equal in effect to that of the Morrill tariff bill, has had the effect to cheapen in price and improve in character the very iron and machinery in which England thought herself safe from all rivalry.

OUR OWN EXPERIENCE.

In our country the periods of protection have been those of prosperity. In 1842 the country was suffering in every part until revived by the beneficent act of that year. This continued until the act of 1846 checked our growth, while that of 1857 would have absolutely destroyed us but for the rapid increase of our population and the indomitable energy of the people. The calamities of the war forced us to the enactment of the tariff of 1861, which was the wisest and best we have ever had, not excepting that of 1842. The Morrill tariff will be known in history as the great agency by which the country was enabled to pass successfully through the war, and to grow in material prosperity. The high price of gold made its duties almost prohibitory, and we were thrown upon our own resources, which expanded incredibly at the call, and nerved the trade of the country to bear with ease the unequalled strain upon it.

THE MORRILL TARIFF.

I may be asked whether we are not now under the Morrill tariff. I answer, we are in theory, but not in fact. All that the manufacturing interests of the country ask, and I speak confidently for my own constituents, is to be placed where that tariff placed them in 1861. But it should not be forgotten that since that time the cost of foreign manufacture has not materially changed, but the cost of domestic manufacture has doubled, and in some cases triplicated. The excise tax reaches almost everything which enters into manufacture. To place the two competitors where they were in 1861, our tariff duties should be increased so as to equal the increased cost of labor and the excise tax. This done, the condition of the country will improve in every part, and no one will feel the blow except the foreigner who hates us and his agent here who is undermining us.

RETURN TO SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The opinion prevails that a return to specie payments will remove all these evils. But it will not relieve the country of its taxes. It can only modify the cost of some raw materials, and probably of labor. Hence its effect can be but partial. I desire the return to specie payments, and would greet it with my whole heart, but in my opinion the true line of policy is in the direction I have indicated. By increasing the rate of duties to the point suggested our excessive importation will be restrained, the balance of trade will be thrown in our favor, our coin will be kept at home to fill the channels of business and become once more the circulating medium among the people. With present legislation this is hopeless. During the last four years our exports of coin have exceeded the imports $177,778,163, as follows:

	Imported.	Exported.	Excess.
1862.....	$16,415,068	$36,887,640	$20,472,572
1863.....	9,584,105	63,392,036	$53,807,931
1864.....	13,115,612	69,390,485	56,274,873
1865.....	7,225,377	54,448,184	47,222,807

With this tendency to enormous importation of goods and the increasing necessity of gold exportations to pay for them checked, it is not unreasonable to hope that the product of our gold mines retained in the country a few years will enable us to glide into specie payments naturally and without shock to any of the great business interests of the country. It will be much easier to resume specie payments on the $740,000,000 of paper money now afloat, on this plan, than to contract the currency to half its present volume and allow the present rate of foreign importation ($12,000,000 per week) to continue.

All experience demonstrates the necessity of self-protection among nations. The American legislator who is blind to this truth must be ignorant of the business history of his own country as well as that of the civilized world. No nation can prosper without regarding its special capabilities, without developing them, without using the advantages which God has given it. With us this is a peculiarly imperative duty, because our labor is not only our financial need, but it is our political sovereign. Our Government rests upon its laborers; our strength comes from them; our hope is in them. As they sink the nation sinks; as they rise the nation rises in all the components of greatness and power. Let us be just to these willing giants who support the fabric of freedom, and the jewel of liberty will remain forever, blessing our children's children.

RESTORATION.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, had debate been allowed on the civil rights bill after it was returned by the Senate to this House with the objections of the President, I would not have troubled the House with any remarks on this occasion; but the principles involved in that bill and of other kindred measures which have been introduced into the present Congress, are of such an extraordinary character as may well challenge the profound attention and close examination of Congress and of the country. Their consideration demands an inquiry into the nature and powers of the Federal Government, and I propose very briefly to examine some of the questions which seem to me appropriate to this discussion.

Our system of government, Federal and State, is a complex one, and the boundaries which separate and fix the powers of each, engaged the most anxious and thoughtful consideration of the great men who framed the Constitution of the United States. No question was presented and discussed in the Convention of so much interest and importance as this. It was upon this great question that the Convention was principally divided; and if any one thing was settled in that Convention, and by the conventions of the several States, which afterwards ratified the Constitution, it was, that the Federal Government was to be one of limited and delegated powers, which were clearly defined in the instrument, and that it could exercise no powers not thus expressly granted, except such as were necessary to carry out express grants.

The powers conferred upon Congress, high and important as they are, are comparatively few in number, and are defined in section eight article one of the Constitution. I know that some gentlemen claim that a great deal may be done under the last clause of the section to which I have referred, which provides that Congress shall have power—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

But, sir, this clause confers no new or additional power upon Congress. It simply authorizes Congress to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers granted in the Constitution.

Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, speaking of this clause, said:

"With respect to the supposed operation of what is denominated the sweeping clause, the gentleman was mistaken; for it only extended to all enumerated powers. Should Congress attempt to extend it to any power not enumerated it would not be warranted by the clause."

Justice Story, in his Commentaries, speaking on the same subject, says:

"The plain import of this clause is, that Congress shall have all incidental and instrumental powers necessary and proper to carry into execution all express powers. It neither enlarges any power specifically granted, nor is it a grant of any new power to Congress."

In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, announces the same doctrine. He says:

"This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge."

The Constitution was formed by a people who had been in the possession and enjoyment of State governments of long standing. These States had entered into a Government under Articles of Confederation, which, after the pressure of the war of independence had been removed, proved inadequate for the purposes of a General Government; and the States, sovereign and independent as they were, having all the machinery and attributes of governments in themselves, so far as the same had not by the Articles of Confederation been "expressly delegated to the United States," undertook to form a more perfect Union; and to that end sent delegates to a Convention; and the result of their labors, the Constitution which they framed, was submitted, not to the people of the United States, for ratification, but was submitted to the several States, to be ratified by the people of each State acting through their own conventions, and was to be binding only on such of the States as should thus ratify, thus making it a Federal Government. The extent and character of the powers conferred upon the Government thus formed, were delegated powers, defined and limited, and all power not granted was from the very nature of the grant reserved to the granting power, namely, to the States and the people.

Now, was any power delegated by this Constitution to Congress to regulate the internal affairs of the States, or control contracts, prescribe who should be witnesses or parties in suits, who should inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property in the several States? None whatever, except that it is prohibited to the States to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Justice Story, speaking of this Government, says:

"They have made it a limited Government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of certain powers, and reserved all others to the States or to the people."

Mr. Madison, in the Federalist, says:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government, are few and defined. Those which are to remain with the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will for the most part be connected."

"The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which in the ordinary course of affairs concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

It must be evident from this that Mr. Madison, who is justly regarded as the father of the Constitution, never dreamed that such a power as is assumed in the civil rights act, would ever be claimed or exercised by Congress.

But again, Mr. Marshall, afterward Chief Justice, speaking of the Constitution, (3 Elliot's Debates, 553,) asks:

"Has the Government of the United States power to make laws on every subject? Does he understand it so? Can they make laws concerning the mode of transferring property, or contracts, or claims between citizens of the same State? Can they go beyond the delegated powers? If they were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judges as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard."

But this House, by a majority of more than two thirds, has solemnly decided that Congress can do precisely what Marshall believed the Federal Government had no power to do.

Mr. Madison, in the twenty-ninth number of the Federalist, discussing the character of the then proposed Constitution, and to prove that it created a Federal, and not a national Government, says:

"The idea of a national government involves in it not only an authority over the individual citizens, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things, so far as they are objects of lawful government."

"Among a people consolidated into one nation, this supremacy is completely vested in the national Legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes, it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal Legislatures. In the former case, all local authorities are subordinate to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject within their respective spheres to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere."

"In this relation, then, the proposed government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over other objects."

And still further, in discussing the same question, speaking of the adoption of the Constitution, Mr. Madison says:

"Were the people regarded in this transaction as forming one, the will of the majority of the whole people of the United States would bind the minority in the same manner as the majority in each State must bind the minority; and the will of the majority must be determined by a comparison of the individual votes, or by considering the will of the majority of the States, as evidence of the majority of the people of the United States. Neither of these rules has been adopted. Each State in ratifying the Constitution is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act. In this relation, then, the new Constitution will, if established, be a Federal, and not a national Constitution."

But each of the States in ratifying the Constitution gave expression to the strong and unmistakable sentiment of the people, that the Government formed thereby should be one of limited and delegated powers only.

The State of Massachusetts, in her convention of delegates, made the following formal declaration:

"And as it is the opinion of this convention that certain amendments and alterations in the said Constitution would remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of the Commonwealth, and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the General Government, the convention do therefore recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced into said Constitution: first, that it be explicitly declared that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution are reserved to the several States to be by them exercised."

New Hampshire, Virginia, North and South Carolina, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, all evinced the same anxiety to have it distinctly understood, that the General Government could exercise no power not delegated, and that all powers not so delegated were reserved; and so strong and universal was this sentiment, that it soon found itself embodied in that amendment to the Constitution which declares:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

Again, Mr. Madison, in speaking on the subject of express powers, lays down this rule:

"Whenever, therefore, a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power, the first question is, whether the power be expressed in the Constitution. If it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be whether it is properly an incident to an express power, and necessary to its execution. If it be, it may be exercised by Congress. If it be not, Congress cannot exercise it."

"I consider the foundation of the Constitution as laid on this ground, that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or the people. To take a single step beyond the boundary thus especially drawn around the powers of Congress, is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible of any definition."

It is unnecessary that I should multiply authorities on this point.

Neither is there in this plain and undeniable doctrine as to the powers of the Federal Government, any warrant whatever for the heresies of secession and nullification; heresies which I have always opposed. The Federal Government is supreme in all its constitutional powers; so are the States supreme in the same way; and there is not necessarily to be any conflict. There cannot, it is true, be two supremes over the same subject-matter, but the Federal Government, and the States, are each supreme in their respective constitutional spheres.

But, sir, the danger to-day is not in secession, or any threatened or apprehended encroachment by the States, on the just and constitutional powers of the General Government. It meets us in the other direction—in the strong and well-organized attempt to destroy the just and constitutional rights of the States, and establish on their ruins a great and powerful centralized system.

As a part of this attempted revolution, bloodless it is true, but nevertheless a revolution of the most dangerous character, we have schemes and propositions pressed upon Congress which should arouse the fears of every true patriot, and stimulate him to the most determined exertions, to preserve our admirable system of government. Not only have eleven of the States of this Union during this session of Congress, in the very face of the plainest provisions of the Constitution, been denied all representation, but members duly elected to both branches of Congress, have been ousted from their seats, by the action of a domineering majority, and in some cases others admitted, who no intelligent man will pretend, represent the views of the majorities in their districts.

But, sir, this majority, not content with thus depriving nearly one third of the States of this Union of representation, have seized upon this opportunity to force through, and to continue to press, upon this Congress, measures which no one could expect would be adopted by the representatives of the people of all the States, if their voice could be heard in these Halls.

The legislation contained in the civil rights act being, in my judgment, so palpably in violation of the Constitution, I would be false to myself and my convictions of duty, if I did not most earnestly protest against it. The first section provides—

"That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared citizens of the United States, without distinction of color or race."

And it further defines what rights shall be enjoyed by the persons so made citizens of the United States, namely:

"To make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property."

And to have—

"Full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

The second section provides:

"That any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

It is thus sought to establish an equality between the white and colored races by Congress, in all of the States of this Union, in the enumerated rights and immunities defined in the sections already quoted, and to prohibit the States from making any discrimination in any of the particulars named between the races. Sir, this measure invades the local legislation of the States, and controls it. It lays prostrate at the feet of Federal power the right of each State to regulate and control its own domestic concerns.

But not satisfied with subverting the legislative powers of the States, it strikes down the independence of the judiciary of the States, and subjects the judges of their courts to the arrest of some petty mercenary agent of the organized band of detectives which this act creates; thus overriding and completely subverting the free exercise of the local powers of all the States, by placing their officers under the control and surveillance of the Federal authorities.

Sir, if there is anything which the people of this Union will never abandon, without a struggle worthy of all the great defenders of free government, it is the great right revered and cherished by a free people, of each State to regulate and control its own domestic affairs, unchallenged and uncontrolled by any other power or authority whatever, except the Constitution of the United States.

Where, allow me to inquire, do you get the power to declare that "all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States?" No such power is conferred by the Constitution. Congress, it is true, has the authority "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," but the effect of naturalization is only to remove the disabilities existing on account of alienage. But this power does not authorize Congress to confer citizenship on a person born within the United States.

Mr. Justice Curtis, in his dissenting opinion in the Dred Scott case, (19 Howard R.,) has very ably examined and considered this question, and he says:

"It appears, then, that the only power expressly granted to Congress to legislate concerning citizenship is confined to the removal of disabilities of foreign birth."

And—

"Whether there be anything in the Constitution from which a broader power may be implied will best be seen when we come to examine the two other alternatives, which are, whether all free persons born on the soil of the several States, or only such of them as may be citizens of each State respectively, are thereby citizens of the United States. The last of these alternatives, in my judgment, contains the truth."

But, sir, the whole scope and purposes of the provisions of the sections to which I have referred, are at war with the rights of the States.

Many examples could be presented, to illustrate how completely they subvert the powers of the States to regulate their own internal affairs.

Suppose the Legislature of a State should provide that no person should be a witness in a criminal case who was under twelve years of age, except where the witness offered was a negro, in which case he should be of the age of fourteen years. Here would be a clear discrimination on account of color, and however much the policy of such a law might be questioned or discussed, yet it seems to me that no one can seriously question the right of the States to adopt such legislation. But, sir, not only the members of the Legislature who should vote for the passage of such a law, but the judges who under their convictions of duty and oath of office, should administer it, would be liable to arrest, trial, and conviction in the courts of the United States, and exposed to suffer imprisonment for one year, and to pay a fine of $1,000. An exceedingly "civil" act, indeed. A State may in its discretion believe it necessary for the best interests of its people, in relation to certain crimes committed by a colored man, to impose upon him a "different" punishment from that imposed upon a white citizen; but here also this law steps in and rudely thrusts aside the laws of the State, and subjects both those who enacted, as well as those who enforce the State law, to the penalties already described.

Other examples of the interference of this law with the local legislation of the States, could be cited to show how it invades the reserved rights of the States, and centralizes power in the Federal Government, but it is unnecessary, as they will readily suggest themselves to the mind of every man who will consider this question. And the cases arising under this act are to be tried in the courts of the United States. Thus the State courts are to be deprived of hearing and determining controversies, growing out of that vast field of questions embraced in the class of rights described in this act, between the inhabitants of the same State, or, it may be, of the same county. And to enforce these extraordinary provisions the President is required to have always at hand a reserved military force.

The ninth section provides:

"That whenever the President of the United States shall have reason to believe that offenses have been, or are likely to be committed against the provisions of this act within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney of such district to attend at such place within the district and for such time as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with a violation of this act."

So we are to have a traveling court, going around from one neighborhood to another, to look after such persons as are likely to commit offenses against the provisions of this wonderful act; and as if to stimulate the swarms of deputies who are authorized by this law to be created to make arrests, they are to be paid by the United States the sum of five dollars for each arrest they may make, with such other fees as may be deemed reasonable by the commissioner for additional services.

And for whom are all these strange and extraordinary powers to be exerted? Not for the white men and women of this country. No, sir; the rights of the States are to be thus invaded, the legislative and judicial departments of the States are to be stricken down at the feet of Federal power, because the people of the States may not, in the civil rights and immunities enumerated in this act, be willing to place the negro race on a perfect equality with themselves.

Well may the President say, as he has said in that most able and unanswerable document containing his objections to this measure, that "In all our history, in all our experience as a people living under Federal and State law, no such system as that contemplated by the details of this bill has ever before been proposed or adopted. They establish for the colored race safeguards which go infinitely beyond any that the General Government has ever provided for the white race. In fact, the discrimination of race and color is by the bill made to operate in favor of the colored and against the white race."

And now, let me inquire under what power delegated in the Constitution you may do all this. Certainly not under the clause which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This clause has never before been invoked to sanction such startling legislation as this, and it seems to me no sound lawyer would risk his reputation by seriously asserting that this clause would warrant this measure. But I believe the power has been claimed under the second clause of the recent amendment abolishing slavery.

Now, what is the power contained in that provision? It confers upon Congress the power to enforce the amendment which abolishes slavery. It was not the purpose, nor does it in the least affect, the questions relating to contracts, parties who may sue or be witnesses, or inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, for these are subjects which have always been regulated and controlled by all the States, both North and South. The power evidently was intended to enable the Federal Government to prevent any State, or the people in any State, from continuing or re-establishing the institution of slavery; and if any of the States, or the people of any of the States, should attempt to enslave any person, this clause was intended to give to Congress the power to prevent such oppression, and to that end appropriate legislation is authorized. But, sir, to my mind, it seems perfectly absurd to claim under this clause, the right to control the local legislation of the States which regulate the questions as to who "shall make and enforce contracts, sue, be parties and give evidence, inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property." The States have always exercised exclusive jurisdiction over these questions, unchallenged and unquestioned, and the power to interfere in these matters has never been granted by the States to the Federal Government. To enslave a man is one thing, but for a State by its legislation to refuse to place the negro upon a perfect equality with its white men and women, in relation to the rights enumerated in this act, is quite another and a different thing, and one which must be left to the sound discretion of the States. This Congress has no more constitutional right to interfere with the local legislation of the States on the subjects embraced in this act than it has to regulate an eclipse of the sun.

Sir, I am not the enemy of the colored race. Heaven knows that I have not the least unkind or ill feeling toward them; and while I shall, as a citizen of Ohio, steadily oppose conferring upon the negro the right of suffrage, I shall always encourage, and be gratified to witness, a wise and liberal policy practiced toward them by the several States.

I have no doubt but that the generous and patriotic sentiments expressed by Alexander H. Stephens in his speech of the 22d February last, not only express the views of the people of his State, but of a majority of the people of all the States, in which this population is found. In that speech, speaking of the colored race, he said:

"In legislation, therefore, under the new system, you should look to the best interests of all classes—their protection, security, advancement, and improvement, physically, intellectually, and morally. All obstacles, if there should be any, should be removed, which can possibly hinder or retard the improvement of the blacks to the extent of their capacity. All proper aid should be given to their own efforts. Channels of education should be opened up to them. Schools and the usual means of moral and intellectual training should be encouraged among them. This is the dictate, not only of what is right and proper and just in itself, but it is also the promptings of the highest considerations of interest. It is difficult to conceive a greater evil or curse that could befall our country, stricken and distressed as it now is, than for so large a portion of its population as this class will quite probably constitute among us hereafter, to be reared in ignorance, depravity, and vice."

But, sir, if the Federal Government may thus invade and control the legislation of the States, in regard to their laws regulating the civil rights enumerated in this act, what is to restrain it from regulating all other legislation of the States? You have just as much power to regulate and control the laws of the States relating to marriage, divorce, dower, alimony, common schools, the assessment and collection of taxes, as you have to regulate the laws relating to the several matters contained in this law. Nay, more than this, by the exercise of the same power, Congress may regulate and control the political rights of the people of the several States. You have precisely as much power in the one case as in the other; and that is, just none at all. You have as much right to say to the States that they shall allow the negro to vote, and hold office, as you have to say that they shall permit him to be a witness. The fact is you have no constitutional power to do either, and when it shall be acquiesced in by the people of the United States, that the General Government may exercise such powers, then, indeed, may we bid farewell to the rights of the States and our system of free government.

Such, sir, it seems to me, is the purpose of the men who control the majority in this Congress. A spirit of aggression upon the rights of the States, strong, bold, and determined, is busy at its work, and if not arrested by the clear and overwhelming condemnation of the people, at the coming elections, it may be too late to resist these encroachments, which gain strength as they advance.

Sir, in my judgment the doctrines of the distinguished gentlemen who control this Congress are inconsistent with our system of government, State and Federal. Their organization can only survive by so changing the system which our fathers framed, as to make it conform to their radical views of policy; and to effect this purpose, they must have a continuance of power. Eleven States of this Union, clearly entitled to representation, must be excluded, and their voice hushed in silence, while such important, unwarranted, and radical measures are fastened upon the country.

Sir, I warn the people, that although the rebellion has been suppressed, although we are at peace, at home and abroad, yet danger, the most threatening and disastrous, lurks within our borders; that schemes, the most dangerous to our system of government, are pressed upon Congress. Well may the President, who so nobly stands by the Constitution to ward off the assaults made on that sacred instrument, declare that—

"They interfere with the municipal legislation of the States; with the relations existing exclusively between a State and its citizens, or between inhabitants of the same State; an absorption and assumption of power by the General Government, which, if acquiesced in, must sap and destroy our federative system of limited powers, and break down the barriers which preserve the rights of the States. It is another step or rather stride toward centralization and the concentration of all legislative powers in the national Government. The tendency of this bill must be to resuscitate the spirit of the rebellion, and to arrest the progress of those influences which are more closely drawing around the States the bonds of union and peace."

Sir, I thank the President for his noble, manly, and patriotic defense of the Constitution and the rights of the States. Sometimes when I contemplate the rapid strides with which the extremists are carrying forward their inroads upon the great landmarks of our Federal system, I shudder at the dangers which threaten us. But, sir, I have not lost all hope. So long as we have a faithful and honest Executive, and a patriotic people, I will not despair. It is to the people at last to whom we must look for the proper correctives. Free government can only be maintained by constant vigilance.

"The spirit of liberty will not permit power to overstep its prescribed limits, though good intent, patriotic intent, come along with it."

Gentlemen cannot deceive the people by declaring that this law only involves civil rights. Sir, it does more, it involves the right of the Federal Government to declare the laws and constitutions of the States, which exclude negroes from voting, holding office, and acting as jurors, illegal, and set them aside, and punish the authorities of the States for executing them; because if this may be done in regard to civil rights, so it may in regard to political rights. Sir, I deny that any such powers have been delegated to the General Government; and if their exercise shall be sanctioned by the people, then, indeed, will the rights of the States, and all local legislation have been completely stricken down, and our Federal system converted into an overshadowing, centralized despotism.

Sir, I shall always be found supporting the General Government in all its just and constitutional powers, as "the sheet-anchor of our peace at home, and safety abroad;" but, sir, I shall, with the same determined zeal, support and defend the just rights and powers of the States. They are our most efficient and competent governments for the home rights of the people; "and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies." The maintenance of these rights are essential to our system of government.

It is strange to witness to-day the men who, but a few years ago, were the most clamorous advocates for the rights of the States, supporting this and kindred measures, calculated to subvert the rights of the States.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, in a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States, on the 23d of February, 1855, declared—

"I recognize the democratic doctrine of State rights, in its application to slavery as well as to other local affairs, and while I have a seat in this Chamber I shall resist all attempts to encroach upon the reserved rights of the sovereign States of the Union. I will stand side by side with my Democratic friends in vindication of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798 and 1799, which they indorsed at Baltimore in 1852."

How emphatic he is in the declaration that he would "resist all attempts to encroach upon the reserved rights of the sovereign States of the Union."

But Mr. WADE, in a speech delivered at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, was quite as clear and distinct in his utterances in behalf of the rights of the States:

"There are some Senators who profess a great regard for the rights of the States. I am one of those who have quite as much regard for the rights of the States as some who make louder professions on the subject than I do. I am one of those who, not only when an election is pending, but at all times, believe in the wisdom, the constitutionality, and the propriety of the Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799. I ground myself upon those resolutions; and, standing upon them, I denounce this bill as a violation, not only of the spirit of those resolutions, but as an attempt to trample upon the rights of the States and deprive them of the power to protect their own citizens from aggression and abuse. Do gentlemen suppose that the States, now awakened to a keen sense of their rights and the danger of consolidation, will ever submit to such a bill as this? I tell you nay."

"Who is to be the judge in the last resort of the violation of the Constitution of the United States by the enactment of a law? Who is the final arbiter? The General Government or the States in their sovereignty? Why, sir, to yield that point is to yield up all the rights of the States to protect their own citizens, and to consolidate this Government into a miserable despotism. I tell you, sir, whatever you may think of it, if this bill pass, collisions will arise between the Federal and State jurisdictions—collisions more dangerous than all the wordy wars which are got up in Congress—collisions in which the States will never yield; for the more you undertake to load them with acts like this, the greater will be their resistance."—Congressional Globe, Appendix, pp. 213, 214.

You see that he carries his views of State rights to their most extreme verge, and speaks of the States "in their sovereignty."

But, sir, there was a celebrated meeting held at Cleveland, Ohio, by distinguished Republicans of that State in May, 1859, which was addressed by Mr. Chase, then the Governor of Ohio, and at which, among other resolutions, the following was adopted:

"1. That the several States composing the United States of America are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government; but that, by compact, under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes, delegated to that Government certain definite powers, reserving each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force, and being void, can derive no validity from mere judicial interpretation; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party; that this Government, created by this compact, was not made the exclusive final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the Constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the modes and measures of redress."

Sir, here the Republicans who adopted this resolution have indorsed the most extreme doctrines; doctrines on which it is charged the South based their recent rebellion.

I know that it has been announced in the Senate, by a friend of the Chief Justice, that although he did make a speech at the Cleveland meeting which passed this resolution, yet that he was not aware of the fact that such a resolution had been adopted.

But I find in a Cleveland paper an extract from a letter reported to have been written, a short time before the Cleveland meeting, by Mr. Chase, in response to an invitation to join in a meeting at Boston, to celebrate the birthday of Thomas Jefferson; which I will read:

"And how large the debt we owe him on other grounds: for his lessons of confidence in the masses of the people; of just regard in legislation and administration to all home interests, and of the wise liberality toward emigrants from other lands seeking free and honorable homes in ours; for his warnings against extravagance in Government expenditure, and its inevitable concomitants, oppressive taxation and debt; against the surrender or compromise of the rights of the States; against the centralizing tendencies, so dangerous to liberty, of Federal power; and last, but by no means least, against the silent and, because silent, most perilous encroachments of a Federal judiciary, perverted from its noble function of administering justice into a convenient means for the subversion of State sovereignty and the destruction of the most sacred guarantees of personal freedom."

It is possible that some political friend of the Chief Justice may be able also to put in a disclaimer about this letter. I know no more about it than what I find in the paper from which it has been read. But, sir, during this same period, and while Mr. Chase was the Governor of the State of Ohio, the celebrated cases of ex parte Bushnell and ex parte Langston were argued and decided in the supreme court of that State, and the same doctrines which are declared in the Cleveland resolution, were argued at great length, and with much ability, by the then attorney general of Ohio, Mr. Walcutt, a leading Republican, and afterwards Assistant Secretary of War under Mr. Lincoln's administration, and his extreme views of the reserved powers of the States, were sustained by two of the judges of that court, Judges Brinkerhoff and Sulliff, both of whom were Republicans. In that argument he said:

"But then it is said that the courts of the United States are supreme within their sphere; all agree to that; but what then? So also are the State courts supreme within their sphere; and the same argument which proves that the Federal courts have a right to determine the extent of their jurisdiction and impose that determination on State courts, proves equally, that the State courts have also the right to determine the extent of their jurisdiction, and conclude the Federal courts in that determination."

But again, he says:

"Any nation which has wholly surrendered the allegiance of its citizens or its correlative incidental right to protect them while within its territorial limits, has in that very act abnegated every attribute of sovereignty and become the mere local dependency of the power to which that allegiance and right have been surrendered. But Ohio is still a sovereign State, and has therefore never yielded this right, as she never could yield it, and still preserve her sovereignty, to the Federal or any other Government."

Further on, in the same argument, in speaking of the powers of the Federal Government, he says:

"The powers granted being granted by independent sovereignties, it not only follows, as the result of all just reasoning, that all powers not granted are withheld."

Judge Brinkerhoff, a distinguished member of the Republican party, in delivering his dissenting opinion in these cases, uses the following language:

"I know no way other than through the action of the State governments, in which the reserved rights and powers of the States can be preserved, and the guarantees of individual liberty be vindicated. The history of this country, brief as it is, already shows that the Federal judiciary is never behind the other departments of that Government, and often foremost in the assumption of non-granted powers. And let it be finally yielded, that the Federal Government is in the last resort the authoritative judge of the extent of its powers, and the reservations and limitations of the Constitution, which the framers of that instrument so jealously endeavored firmly to fix and guard, will soon be, if they are not already, obliterated; and that Government, the sole possessor of the only means of revenue, in the employment of which the people can be kept ignorant of the extent of their own burdens, and with its overshadowing patronage, attracting to its support the ambitious by means of its hor ors, and the mercenary through the medium of its emoluments, will speedily become, if it be not already, practically omnipotent.

And all of this, in the opinion of the learned judge, is to follow, if it be conceded that "the Federal Government is in the last resort the authoritative judge of the extent of its own powers and the reservations and limitations of the Constitution."

Judge Sutfill, in the same case, fully sustains the views advanced by the attorney general and Judge Brinkerhoff, and enters into an elaborate discussion to show the nature and extent of the powers of the Federal Government. I will only detain the House by reading a few extracts from Judge Sutfill's opinion. He says:

"It is certain, therefore, not only that the Constitution does not, by any provision therein expressed, make the State governments, or any department thereof, subordinate to the Federal Government, or to any department thereof; but it is also evident that the proposition in various shapes to subordinate the State governments to the Federal Government in its legislative, executive, or judicial department was fully considered, and rejected by the framers of the Constitution."

Again, he says:

"It is therefore evident, both from the language and the early construction of the instrument, that the rights of the several State governments are as full and ample under the Constitution to protect the powers which they had not delegated, as is the Federal Government to protect the powers which had in fact been delegated to it. This right to protect its own legislative, executive, and judicial powers belonged to each of the States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The States in convention refused to surrender the right, or even to suffer it to be qualified. The power was not delegated in the Constitution, nor by it prohibited to the States, and is therefore reserved and still belongs to the State."

These opinions, it is true, were delivered by these learned judges, in a case in which they undertook to declare the fugitive slave law unconstitutional.

Mr. Chase, while these cases were pending in the supreme court of Ohio, was the Governor of that State, and I would be pleased to know, if the supreme court had held the fugitive slave law unconstitutional, and ordered the discharge of Bushnell and Langston, whether it was not the purpose of the Governor and his friends, to enforce and maintain the decision of that court, to the last extremity against the Federal Government? Certain it is that the views of these dissenting judges were indorsed by their party in Ohio, because Judge Swan, who with the majority of the court held the law constitutional, was defeated a short time afterward, in the Republican State convention for renomination, while Judge Brinkerhoff was in due season renominated and re-elected by that party.

But, sir, the convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency at Chicago, in 1860, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend, and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force, of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

And Mr. Lincoln in his first inaugural quoted this resolution as a law to himself and those who had nominated him.

Sir, I have quoted from these distinguished gentlemen in the Republican party, to show how industrious they have been in the past, in advocating the rights of the States, and to contrast their speeches and declarations then, with their position now in supporting measures, which strike at the very existence of the States.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this organized attempt to centralize power in Congress, is revolutionary, and it is so because it is attempted by the exercise of unwarranted power.

It is revolutionary because a majority of this Congress persistently, and unconstitutionally, refuse to eleven States of this Union any representation whatever. It is revolutionary because, taking advantage of the absence of such representation, whose presence is unconstitutionally prevented, this same majority seek to fasten upon the country, measures which are not sanctioned either by the Constitution, or by a majority of the citizens of the United States.

Sir, I do not propose to enter upon an argument to prove that all of these States are in the Union—that their attempt to withdraw was a failure—that the result of the late terrible conflict was to preserve and not destroy the Union. All this I discussed in a speech which I made in this House during the early part of this session.

These States, then, being in the Union, and peace having been completely restored, there is no constitutional right whatever for depriving them of their just and constitutional representation. All talk about establishing, or requiring conditions or guarantees from them, before they shall be represented in Congress, is mere trifling with this great question. If these States are in the Union, as I insist they are, then you can no more exact conditions from them than you can from New York or Massachusetts. These States are all equal States, and each one is entitled to be represented, and to deny such representation, is not only clearly unauthorized, it is worse; it is revolutionary.

The Constitution declares that "the Senate of the United States shall consist of two Senators from each State," and to prevent a majority of the States from combining to deprive any State of its representation in the Senate, it is also declared that "no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Is any State to-day deprived without its consent of its equal suffrage in the Senate? Sir, we all know that eleven States are in violation of these plain provisions of the Constitution, deprived of any voice whatever in that body. And in relation to the House of Representatives the Constitution is equally clear and explicit; and among other provisions it is declared that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers," which is determined in a mode provided in the Constitution. These Representatives are to be apportioned among the States every ten years; and the same instrument declares that "each State shall have at least one Representative," thus establishing firmly the great principle of taxation and representation. The direct taxes have been assessed and are being collected, but the representation is denied.

Sir, the true Union men of this country are those who are for the immediate restoration of all these States, to their just and constitutional relations with the Federal Government; and the admission of Senators and Representatives constitutionally qualified. To deny these States these constitutional rights, is an attempt at disunion.

Sir, I am to-day, as I have always been, for the Union of all the States. I am opposed, as I have always been, to all attempts to break up this Union, whether they come from the North or the South.

The questions which are now pending are, in my judgment, of the most grave and serious character: union or disunion; the preservation of our system of Government, or the consolidation of power in the hands of Congress; the absorption of the clear rights of States, and practically the establishment of a centralized despotism.

These great issues have been made. The purposes of the majority of this Congress are clearly understood. You have the power now to pass what measures you please; you can deprive States of their constitutional voice in Congress; you can deprive clear majorities of the voters in districts in the northern States from being represented by the men of their choice. But, sir, it will not always be so. No, sir; no, sir. There is a power higher and stronger than yours, which will overrule you. The people—that people who love free government, and who have sacrificed so much to maintain it; that people who revere and cherish the Union of these States, and who will never abandon it; that people will demand, in a voice not to be misunderstood, a return to the requirements of the Constitution. They will sit in judgment on these great questions, and send Representatives here who will respect the just rights of the States; who will seek to heal and not destroy; who will labor to unite and not separate; who will, with that true and generous policy which finds but little favor here, welcome into these Halls, Representatives from all the States, who may be devoted to the Constitution, and determined to maintain the Union.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to a privileged question. I notice that I am down among those not voting on the motion to lay upon the table the Northern Pacific railroad bill. I voted in the negative, and I ask that the correction be made.

The correction was made accordingly.

Mr. BANKS submitted some remarks which will be found in the Appendix.

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. BANKS,

Mr. GRINNELL said: My colleague, [Mr. PRICE,] who had charge of the Northern Pacific railroad bill, is not able to be here to-day. I am requested to state on his behalf that no one regrets more than he that circumstances prevented his yielding the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] as he had intended to do. He would have been pleased to hear the able and logical speech we have just listened to.

Mr. BUNDY obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. GRINNELL, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly, (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. COBB: The memorial of the corporation of Washington, asking to be repaid certain moneys advanced to the General Government.

By Mr. FINCK: The petition of Semantha Haskins, widow of John Rader, deceased, of Fairfield county, Ohio, praying the allowance of a pension.

By Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY: A petition for national insurance law by citizens of Buffalo.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: The petition of citizens of Chicago, for a national insurance company.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 30, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. THEODORE D. WOOLSEY, D.D., President of Yale College.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I present resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts on the state of the Union and the duties of the Government to the freedmen. I ask that they be read, laid on the table, and printed.

The Secretary read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE YEAR 1866.

Resolutions on the state of the Union and the duties of Government to the freedmen.

Resolved, That the rebel States should be held in abeyance, and should not be permitted to join in the management of national affairs through representatives in Congress until the people of said States shall, by fundamental enactments and otherwise, manifest a loyal spirit of submission to the authority and Constitution of the United States, and give such guarantees as Congress may deem sufficient to render it safe and prudent to permit them to again resume the functions and privileges which they voluntarily surrendered by their rebellion and war; and in these matters the right of determination rests with Congress.

Resolved, That we tender our thanks to the Senators and Representatives at Washington for their firmness hitherto in maintaining their principles and for their resistance to all attempts to place in the Halls of Congress disloyal men, or the Representatives of disloyal constituencies, to the peril of the national credit and at the imminent risk of losing by legislation all that we have gained by successful war. And we expect them to maintain this position in the future and to the last.

Resolved, That while thus expressing our confidence in our senatorial and representative delegations in Congress, and the determination of the people to stand by them, we are also impelled to take notice of the recent charges made by name against one of the Senators of this State, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, in the lately published speech of the President of the United States, and to declare that the language used and the charges made by the President are unbecoming the elevated station occupied by him, an unjust reflection upon Massachusetts, and without the shadow of justification or defense founded upon the private or public record of our eminent Senator.

Resolved, That the enlightened judgment of mankind will hold not only the Government, but the people of the United States, to the fulfillment to the uttermost, in letter and in spirit, of the promises solemnly made to the freedmen; and any failure to fulfill them would inflict a stain upon our national character which would debase us among the nations and subject us to the contempt of our contemporaries and of posterity.

Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of hospital stewards of the Army, praying that such action may be taken by Congress as will place them upon an equal footing with those who perform similar service in the armies of Europe, by creating a grade with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry, for those of the corps of hospital stewards who upon examination, may prove themselves competent for the position; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of journeymen book-binders, book printers, and working men of the United States, praying for the repeal of the revenue tax of five per cent. on manufactured books; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of J. S. Giers, of Morgan county, Alabama, setting forth the destitute condition of the people of that State, and praying Congress to take some measures for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Otter Tail county, Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Crow Wing, in that State, via Otter Tail City, to Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the memorial of Merrick & Sons, William Sellers & Co., and other manufacturers of heavy machinery, of Philadelphia, reciting at some length that under the present system of internal revenue they are compelled to pay a complex system of taxes, by which it is uncertain how much the corresponding duty on imported articles should be in order to put them on an equality with foreign manufacturers, and by which it is very difficult for them to ascertain the amount payable on their machinery. They say the system of taxes operates very injuriously to them. They therefore ask that a uniform tax, whatever may be necessary for the Government, shall be levied on the completed article. I ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Abigail Ryan, widow of the late Thomas A. Ryan, a sergeant in company E, seventeenth regiment West Virginia volunteers, praying that she may be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of C. K. Tuckerman, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred for the colonization experiment at Hayti, which, he alleges, was undertaken at the request of President Lincoln; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NYE presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Paul S. Forbes, for relief under his contract with the Navy Department to build and furnish the sloop-of-war Idaho; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of so equalizing the bounties awarded by the Government to soldiers during the late war as to make them as nearly as possible in proportion to the time of actual service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Dodgeville to Avoca, via James Mills, William S. Bear's, and Booth Hollow, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for widening and straightening the channel of the harbor at Superior, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying the establishment of a mail route from Trempealeau Village, by way of Arcadia, Burnside, and Hale, to Sumner, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the appointment of engineers to examine the present water channels through that State, with a view of enlarging the same so as to admit of a uniform steamship navigation from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a memorial of the city council of Portland, Maine, representing that Casco bay furnishes one of the best and safest locations for the reception and preservation of the iron-clad navy of the United States, and that materials and labor can be had cheaper at Portland than at any other sea-board city, and praying that a commission may be appointed to examine the location and report to Congress at its present session; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Rebecca Irwin, widow of Archibald Irwin, who was a private soldier in battery C, first Rhode Island light artillery, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 291) granting a pension to Mrs. Rebecca Irwin. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 475) to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of paymasters in the Army, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 46) for the relief of Henry M. Whittlesey, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Captain F. M. Faircloth, praying for remuneration for property lost on board the steamer Boston, while on an expedition up the Ashepo river, South Carolina, on the 26th of May, 1864, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 79) to authorize the purchase for the Library of Congress of the law library of James L. Pettigru, of South Carolina; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The joint committee, so called, on reconstruction have directed me to report, first, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; second, a bill to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights; third, a bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States. They directed me, further, in reporting this resolution and bills, to say that it was the intention of the committee to accompany them with an extended report of their reasons, and the grounds upon which they report them. Unfortunately, however, such has been the situation of the committee, relying upon the chairman, who has been unable to attend to it on account of illness, that this report has not been drawn; and perhaps we may ask leave to submit the report hereafter in connection with the bills and resolution now reported. It was thought advisable, as it was so late in the session, not to withhold the measures proposed for action for the reason I have stated. It is very possible that the report may be made hereafter if it shall please the Senate to receive it.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; the bill (S. No. 292) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights; and the bill (S. No. 293) declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States, were severally read a first time by their titles, and passed to a second reading.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CHANDLER. A few weeks ago I unintentionally did an act of injustice to a patriotic body of individuals in this city, which I wish to correct. During the winter of 1860-61, there were two military organizations here, the one called the National Rifles and the other the National Volunteers. The National Volunteers was a rebel organization which marched from the District of Columbia into the rebel army; but the National Rifles was composed of the most patriotic citizens of the District. They were the first to march into Virginia; and they headed the column that first crossed the Long Bridge. They furnished a large number of soldiers and a large number of officers to the Union Army, and were really one of the most patriotic bodies in the United States. In the heat of debate, I inadvertently spoke of the National Rifles instead of the National Volunteers. I wish simply to do justice to a patriotic organization, to which I inadvertently did injustice, and I make this statement to correct that injustice.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to make a comment or two on an item that I find in the National Intelligencer to-day, taken from the Washington dispatches to the New York Herald. The item to which I call attention is as follows:

"Governor Fairchild, of Wisconsin, is here to push the appointment of a radical postmaster for Fond-du-Lac, which office will soon be vacated by resignation. The appointment was lately made in accordance with the Governor's views, but was subsequently withdrawn at the urgent request of Wisconsin Johnson Republicans, on the ground that the appointee was not one of them. The appearance of the Governor here to reopen the fight is looked upon as a trifle 'cheeky' by the friends of Senator DOOLITTLE, inasmuch as the Governor went out of his way to endorse and approve the Wisconsin resolutions censuring Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Governor, no doubt, came on at the suggestion of Senator Howe; but it is fair to presume their joint labors will be fruitless. The Post Office Department has at last commenced to look out for the President's friends in the matter of appointments."

Upon this paragraph I wish to say, first, that the Governor of Wisconsin is here on no invitation of mine, and upon no business that I have any sort of connection with. I understand, and I believe, that he came here without the slightest knowledge that there was a vacancy in the post office at Fond-du-Lac. I understand, and I believe, he is here simply to aid in the adjustment of some accounts between the State of Wisconsin and the United States of America, and that he takes no more interest in the question of who shall be postmaster in the city of Fond-du-Lac than any other Republican of the State of Wisconsin does take.

I think it is due to Governor Fairchild that I should say so much; and I think it is due to myself, to the Senate, and to the people of the United States, since this subject has been alluded to, that I should say one thing more about the post office at Fond-du-Lac. There has been no "fight" about it, to begin with. A vacancy exists in that office, occasioned by the resignation of the late incumbent, who has removed from the city, and from the State, and from the United States. My colleague, the Representative from the fifth district of Wisconsin, who lives within twenty miles of that town, whose partner and whose son resides in the town, and who has his principal place of business in that town, and myself, all united in recommending the appointment of a man by the name of Gillette to fill that vacancy. His name was sent in to the Senate. I am glad to have the attention of the chairman of the Post Office Committee. It was referred to that committee, and by that committee reported back to the Senate with a recommendation that he be confirmed. Some one or two weeks ago—I do not recollect the precise time—the name of Mr. Gillette was withdrawn from the Senate by a message from the President of the United States. That withdrawal, I am bound to say, was made without any request of mine, without any consultation with me, without the slightest knowledge on my part that it was to be made, and, as I believe, without the slightest knowledge on the part of any Representative from Wisconsin except my colleague here, and possibly the Representative from the fourth district who was not elected by the Union party, and who probably never will be elected by the Union party until he or the Union party meets with a change of heart. That name was recommended to be withdrawn, as I understand, simply because it was alleged that Mr. Gillette did not support the policy of the President. I understand that it is asserted by the First Assistant Postmaster General that no man, with his consent, shall eat the bread and butter of the President unless he does support the President's policy.

Now, it will be seen that there has been no fight in reference to this subject. It will be seen, and I trust it will be believed, that the Governor is not here with any view to influence the disposition of that office.

Mr. President, I am compelled to draw two or three inferences from the facts I have stated to the Senate. The first is that whereas my colleague and myself were appointed to represent the State of Wisconsin by precisely the same party, I am now not recognized by the executive department of the Government as belonging to the party to which my colleague belongs. That is the first inference I draw, and my conclusion is, that if I do not belong to the party to which my colleague belongs, he does not belong to the party to which I belong. That is another deduction which I draw from this state of facts.

Having stated these two inferences, I have one other thing to say, and that will end my explanation upon this point; and that is, that I dissent entirely from the idea that these offices are in the first place "bread and butter," and secondly, I dissent entirely from the idea that if they are bread and butter, the President owns them. I conceive that they are agencies created by law, which the Congress of the United States makes and the Congress of the United States alone can make; that they are designed not to do the will of the President of the United States, but as agencies to execute the will of Congress; that they are paid by appropriations made by Congress; they will continue while Congress says so and when Congress says so, and are not the private property of anybody, and are not intended as instruments through which the President of the United States or any other individual can dragoon the people of the United States into one idea or another or into one policy or another.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced the appointment of Mr. J. B. GRINNELL, of Iowa, and Mr. J. L. DAWSON, of Pennsylvania, as managers on the part of the House of Representatives at the conference on the concurrent resolution to prohibit the sale of liquors in the Capitol building and grounds, in the place of Mr. HIRAM PRICE, of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, excused.

RAILROAD BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 236) to authorize and establish certain post roads, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, in section one, line six, after the word "Illinois," to insert, "and at Hannibal, Missouri;" so that the section will read:

That it shall be lawful for any person or persons, company or corporation, having authority from the States of Illinois and Missouri for such purpose, to build a bridge across the Mississippi at Quincy, Illinois, and at Hannibal, Missouri, &c.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer an amendment which I propose to the bill as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company, whose road has been completed to the Mississippi river and connects with a railroad on the opposite side thereof, having first obtained authority therefor from the States of Illinois and Iowa, to construct a railroad bridge across said river upon the same terms, in the same manner, under the same restrictions, and with the same privileges as is provided for in this act in relation to the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

Mr. RAMSEY. The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] when this bill was before the Senate some days ago, expressed some surprise that I should advocate the building of bridges upon the Mississippi river. That Senator should have known that at this time, without any authority of law, at least on the part of Congress, there are two bridges upon the Mississippi river which are alleged to be by those who trade upon that river—the navigation interests there—highly obstructive to navigation. There are but three bridges, I think, on the Mississippi river from the falls of St. Anthony to the mouth of that stream. One is at St. Paul. That is a bridge of continuous span. It presents no obstruction to navigation. The bridge is elevated nearly one hundred feet above the ordinary stage of water, and boats of the largest class that navigate the waters of that region pass under it without obstruction and without difficulty. There are two other bridges spanning the Mississippi river, one at Clinton and another at Rock Island, both alleged to be highly obstructive to navigation, and bridges that have been remonstrated against by that interest for years past. So high has been the excitement at times that the boatmen following the river have been upon the point of abating the Rock Island bridge as a nuisance by violence. The remonstrances were so strong against its continuance that in 1859 a commission of officers of the Topographical corps of the United States Army was appointed to visit and examine that bridge.

The engineers of the railroad companies and the river interests differ entirely as to the character of the bridges that should be erected across the Mississippi river. Those having charge of that interest at St. Louis—the Chamber of Commerce—claim that the span upon the pivot bridges should be four hundred feet. On the other hand it is alleged by experienced engineers that a span of that size would be much more obstructive than one of a reasonable size; that the difficulties of opening it at times would be such as unfavorably to obstruct navigation upon that river.

The commission which was sent by the Secretary of War in 1859 to examine the Rock Island bridge was composed of Captain Humphreys, Captain Meade, and Captain Franklin, of the Topographical corps, each of whom has since attained the position of major general in the Army. In their report upon that occasion they said:

"From the drawings above alluded to, and from personal examination, the board found that the railroad bridge is placed at the foot of the rapids, and is thrown from the island of Rock Island to the city of Davenport, Iowa; that it is supported by two stone abutments on the shores, and six stone piers. The spans (five in number) are two hundred and fifty feet broad, the draw spans being at the water-level (nine and one half feet stage) and one hundred and seventeen and one hundred and twelve feet respectively, making the whole length of the bridge fifteen hundred and thirty-five feet.

"The piers, except those of the draws, are thirty-five feet long and seven feet broad at top, and fifty-three feet long and eleven feet broad at the bottom. The two small draw piers are thirty-eight feet long and ten feet broad at top, and fifty-four feet long and fourteen broad at the bottom. The turn-table pier, including the guard pier and starling, is three hundred and fifty-five feet long and forty and one third feet broad at the top, and three hundred and eighty-six feet long and forty-five feet broad at the bottom. This pier is composed of a stone center pier thirty-five feet in diameter at the top, the remainder being crib-work filled with stone. The up-stream starlings of all the piers are isosceles right-angled triangles. The center line of the roadway crosses the turn-table pier two hundred and ten feet from its head, this pier being one hundred and fifteen feet longer and nineteen feet wider on the top than the truss which forms the draw. The superstructure of wood, built upon Howe's patent, is twenty feet above ordinary high and thirty-three feet above ordinary low water."

The great vice in that bridge is the obliquity of the piers to the current of the river. This commission further state:

"It will be seen that above the bridge the direction of the current makes with the axis of the piers, different angles varying from 26° to 14° 30'; that through the Illinois draw of the bridge, the angle with the axis of the pier is 5°, and that below the bridge the angle varies from 8° to 30° 30'."

"Were the same piers placed parallel to the current, the obstruction to the flow of the water would be about one third of what it now is."

"The general level of the river is raised by the piers of the bridge .49 feet, or nearly six inches, and the increase of the mean velocity due to the contraction of the water-way is 2.27 feet per second or 1.55 miles per hour, making the computed velocity under the bridge 5.55 miles per hour."

In summing up their conclusions, they say:

"1. The board is of opinion that the railroad bridge which crosses the Mississippi river between Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, and Davenport, in the State of Iowa, is not constructed according to correct principles, reference being had to the interests of navigation.

"2. The piers of the said bridge are not of the best form, and that there was no practical difficulty in constructing them of the proper form. With the exception of the turn-table pier, the board is of opinion that the defective form of the piers is a matter of no material importance. The turn-table pier will be more particularly referred to in the answer to the next question.

"3. The only pier larger than is necessary is the turn-table pier. This pier, in the opinion of the board, should have been constructed no longer or broader than was absolutely necessary to sustain the truss when the draw is open, and protect it from injury by passing boats. It might have been constructed with a length of two hundred and ninety-five feet, affording ample support and protection, and being actually three hundred and fifty-five feet in length; the difference, sixty feet, is unnecessary, and, in the judgment of the board, pernicious. The effect of making it longer than was absolutely required, is to contract the water-way, increase the velocity, narrow the draw-passage, and present more surface for boats to strike against, thus increasing the difficulty of their passage through the draw. In a pier of this size the form of the starling is of importance, and the upper faces of the pier should have been curved surfaces.

"4. The piers are not placed parallel to the current, but at angles varying from 26° to 14° 30'. The effect of this obliquity is to treble the obstruction to the flow of the water, and consequently to affect the increase of velocity in the same ratio. Another consequence is, that the passages of steamboats and rafts through the draw and between the piers are rendered much more difficult and hazardous. Furthermore, the draw on the Iowa side is rendered useless by the formation of an eddy therein.

"5. The velocities of the different parts of the river in the vicinity of the bridge have already been stated, and will be found tabulated in appendix C.

"6. The eddy on the Iowa side of the turn-table pier, as nearly as could be estimated, is about one hundred feet wide at the foot of the pier, and the turbulence or boiling of the water extends about five hundred feet below. This eddy, however, is constantly varying in its position and dimensions. Its effect on the passages of boats ascending and descending is undoubtedly to render them more difficult, on account of the care required to avoid getting one part of the boat in it while another part is in the current of the draw. It has been previously stated that the effect of this eddy in the Iowa draw is to render it useless."

"In conclusion, the board considers it proper to recapitulate some of the well-known principles of bridge building, to show how far they have been conformed to or departed from in the Rock Island bridge. These principles are:

"1. That at a given place, in locating a bridge over any stream, the site where the velocity of the current is a minimum should be selected.

"2. That in designing a bridge, the piers should have a minimum cross-section consistent with the support of the super-structure thus offering the least obstruction to the flow of the water and increasing the velocity of the current as little as possible.

"3. The piers should always be placed parallel to the thread of the stream, for the same reasons as those stated in the second principle, and because they thus render the passage of boats and rafts less difficult.

"4. In designing a bridge over a river having a large commerce in boats and rafts, the draws and spans should be of the greatest practicable width.

"In applying these principles to the Rock Island bridge, the board is constrained, with extreme regret, to report that all have been violated; thus rendering the bridge not only an obstruction to the navigation of the river, but one materially greater than there was any occasion for.

The board fully appreciates the value and importance of the railroad traffic, and is of opinion that a bridge is necessary and should be constructed, not only at Rock Island, but at other points on the Mississippi river; but it is also of opinion that the interests involved in the free navigation of this noble stream demand that in locating and constructing these bridges unusual study should be brought to bear to insure the presentation of the least possible obstruction to the navigation, and that all considerations of expediency and economy should be made to yield to the paramount interests of the commerce of the river."

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom this bill was referred, sought information on the subject from every source where they could find it. The bill as referred to them provided for a draw of but three hundred feet, leaving a clear draw on either side of the pivot pier of less than one hundred and fifty feet, probably not over one hundred and ten feet. It was also mandatory on the company to build a draw-bridge. Inasmuch as the committee conceived that a bridge of continuous spans was to be greatly preferred to a draw-bridge, they changed the bill in that respect, leaving it optional with the company which to build.

The Senator from Missouri said that there was no use in referring these bills to that committee, that they would make no examination or modification of them, but simply report them as they received them. If he had read the bill as reported by the committee, and also the bill as referred to them, he would have seen that they have made very important modifications, and all in the interests of the navigation. We have provided in the bill as reported that the draw shall be three hundred and fifty feet, leaving a clear passage on either side of the pivot pier of one hundred and fifty feet. If the bridge shall be built with unbroken and continuous spans, it is to be fifty feet above extreme high water. This, we learn from experienced river men, is all that is desired. Where the chimneys are taller than that, the arrangement is to lower them upon the telescopic plan which has been introduced there.

With regard to the spans other than the pivot span, we have the information of competent engineers that an excess of over three hundred feet is not advisable. General McCallum, who had charge of railroad and bridge structures during the war, says:

"The longest draw-bridge ever constructed in this country is of two openings of one hundred and fifty feet each, although I do not consider even a greater length than this impracticable. Nevertheless would consider it unnecessary and impolitic. Any bridge located at right angles with the stream, with current of not more than four miles per hour, all purposes of navigation should be fully met by one hundred and fifty feet openings."

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the bill as reported provides for these openings to be one hundred and seventy-five feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. No, sir; the pivot pier and the one half of the pier at each end of the swing on which it rests detract from their width.

Mr. HOWE. But the span is to be one hundred and seventy-five feet?

Mr. RAMSEY. The span is to be three hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. HOWE. The spans are to be not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on each side of the center or pivot pier of the draw.

Mr. RAMSEY. That makes three hundred and fifty feet in all, and leaves a clear draw of about one hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. HOWE. That leaves an opening of one hundred and seventy-five feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not in the clear.

Mr. HOWE. But it is on the side of the pier.

Mr. RAMSEY. The span is to be three hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. HOWE. Between this pier and the next.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should much prefer that the railroad company should accept it with a span of one hundred and seventy-five feet in the clear. That would require a swing-bridge of four hundred feet.

Mr. HOWE. But I do not understand the engineer to recommend any such thing. I do not understand the authority the Senator just read from to do so.

Mr. RAMSEY. One hundred and fifty feet in the clear. "Spans of not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the bridge." The pier on which it rests on either end of this swing detracts from it; and a fair construction would be from the center of the bridge one hundred and seventy-five feet. The pivot pier is a pier probably twenty feet in width, of greater width than any of the other piers, and under the bill it is required to be. The whole of this immense structure, the swing-bridge, rests upon it. That with the half the pier rests on at either end detracts so much from this length as to reduce it to a clear passage of about one hundred and fifty feet. That much can be done, and I think that much ought to be conceded.

Mr. HOWE. The idea is this: the span is required by the bill to be one hundred and seventy-five feet. The span I understand to be the stretch from pier to pier, and not from the center of one pier to the center of the next.

Mr. RAMSEY. When we framed this bill we understood it to be from the center of the pier to the center of the opposite pier, from the center of the swing pier to the center of the resting pier.

Now, I think in this bill we have guarded all these various interests upon the river. We have insured, I think, a safe passage-way sufficiently large. We have required the piers to be on a line with the current. We have required the elevation to be fifty feet above high water if the bridge be constructed of a continuous span. I think we have provided against every fault that has been heretofore complained of in the other bridges erected upon that river. As I said before, if we could avoid building bridges entirely on the Mississippi river, I should esteem it in the interests of the country which I represent and in the interests of navigation upon that river; but the fact is that almost in spite of law they are building them. At this time I am told they are building a bridge upon the Mississippi river at Burlington. It is, then, important at this time, before these structures are up, when it will be impossible to remove them, the interest for retaining them being so large, that Congress should step in and regulate the construction, so as to be as little injurious to the navigation of the river as possible. No one can appreciate more than I do the importance of the trade on the river. I know that at a few of the towns on the Mississippi—St. Louis, Louisville, and others—the trade of 1865 amounted to more than seven hundred million dollars; twice as much as our foreign trade. In the State of Minnesota, far up at the head of that river, we ourselves shipped eight million bushels of wheat last year. Then the continued navigation of this river to us is of the first importance. But, sir, we realize the fact that in spite of us, in spite of all our desires, in spite of the interest of navigation on that river, they will persist in erecting these bridges; and hence we deem it of the highest importance now, when few have yet been constructed, that Congress should step in and, as well as it can, regulate them. As I said before, there are but three bridges now spanning the river, but there are applications for a dozen in this and the other House of Congress. We know, too, from the immense capital invested in the railroads that approach that river upon the east and upon the west, that they will cross it. It is not to be expected that they should be successfully resisted forever. They will cross it some time. I think now is the time when Congress should step in and regulate them, so as to be as little obstructive as possible.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota before he takes his seat what evidence the committee have that a draw of the length prescribed in this bill is manageable.

Mr. RAMSEY. We have evidence of larger draws, but they have been erected under extraordinary circumstances. There is a bridge at one of the sea-port towns of France longer even than this. There is an iron swing-bridge at Brest, in France, spanning a water passage of three hundred and forty-seven feet clear, movable off its bed, erected at a total cost of $406,000. It is a Government work, erected, I presume, without reference either to the expense of its construction in the first instance, or to the expense of its management afterward. It is desirable, of course, that we should strike a medium in the erection of these swing-bridges on the Mississippi, so as to injure neither the river nor the bridge interest. If we make them too large, they will often be out of order and immovable, and the boats, in passing up and down, will be interrupted. If they are made of smallest size, as requested by some, of course the channel-way will not be large enough for business. Now, the point between the two most desirable is that they should be easily workable, and at the same time as large as can be allowed. In that way the proper medium will be obtained and all interests preserved.

Mr. GRIMES. The proposition now pending before the Senate is an amendment proposed by myself authorizing the construction of a bridge at Burlington, on the Mississippi river, by the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company, upon the same terms and under the same restrictions and with the same powers and privileges that are proposed by this bill to be granted to the company that seeks to be authorized to build a bridge at Quincy, in the State of Illinois—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday last, being the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think this can be disposed of in a short time.

Mr. GRIMES. Very soon, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the special order being laid aside informally, if it does not lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The consideration of Senate bill No. 236 will be continued.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose if there is anybody here who is peculiarly interested in the navigation of the Mississippi river, I am about as much interested as any one else. I have for thirty years lived immediately upon its banks, and I think that I am somewhat familiar with the condition of the commerce of the country connected with that river. A portion of the people in the town in which I live, fancying that the construction of a bridge will not be to their own particular individual benefit, would not favor the passage of this law, while I think that those who take the broadest, most comprehensive, and most correct view on the subject would favor it.

But whatever may be the opinions of my fellow-citizens of that town, there cannot be any question that the commerce and the interests of the State at large, which I have the honor here in part to represent, demand that there should be facilities for crossing the river without breaking the bulk of the freights that are to go over. Then the only question is whether or not bridges can be constructed across the Mississippi river so as to facilitate the crosswise commerce that is going east and west without obstructing or unnecessarily impeding the commerce that has hitherto and which is destined in the future to pass up and down on the river. I am satisfied that the proposition which comes from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ought to be adopted, for the reason that I believe if the bridges are constructed upon the plan which they propose they cannot, by any possibility, be any obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river.

As the Senator from Minnesota has observed, we have two bridges now across the Mississippi river connecting the State of Iowa with the State of Illinois. There has been complaint, and constant complaint, about one of those bridges ever since it was erected, not because they do not open the draw in ample time whenever a steamboat presents itself and demands passage, but because they were unfortunate in placing the piers at the time of its original construction so that they do not stand parallel with the current. Now, this bill specifically requires that in the bridges authorized to be erected under it this necessary point shall be provided for.

Then another trouble with Rock Island bridge, where this difficulty has been, is that it is situated right at the foot of the rapids, where the current which comes over the rapids for ten miles above is much more rapid than at any other point in the Mississippi river from St. Anthony to New Orleans, except at another rapids known as the Des Moines rapids. Those conditions do not exist anywhere else on the river, and no bridge built exactly upon the plan of the Rock Island bridge would present therefore the same impediments that the Rock Island bridge does. But the bill which has come from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads requires that the draw through which boats will be compelled to pass shall be much larger than the draw at Rock Island. I think if I remember aright the draw at the Rock Island bridge is one hundred and twelve feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. One hundred and twelve and one hundred and seventeen feet.

Mr. GRIMES. Under the bill which is now before us, the draw will be one hundred and seventy-five feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not one hundred and seventy-five feet in the clear; about one hundred and fifty or probably a few feet more.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That had better belimited so as to make it clear.

Mr. GRIMES. The only objection I had when I read the bill was that it seemed to me that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads were requiring rather too much when they required a draw of one hundred and seventy-five feet, because the difficulty at the Clinton bridge and the Rock Island bridge has never been in consequence of the width of the draw, but in consequence of the flow of the current occasioned by setting the piers improperly at the time the bridge was constructed.

Now, what will be the effect of the passage of this bill if we adopt it? The Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company are already about to build a bridge at the place where I live. They have the authority from the State of Illinois to do it, and they have the authority of the State of Iowa to do it. They will not put in as wide a draw as is required by this statute unless this statute is passed. Your passing the statute, therefore, facilitates the commerce of the river, by compelling them to put in such a draw as the navigation of the Mississippi river requires; so that in every point of view it seems to me it would be advisable if this bill should pass; and living on the river as I do, and interested in the navigation as I am, a navigation which has been the building up of my town, I am perfectly free to declare that I believe the interests of the river commerce as well as the interests of the internal commerce of the State that wants to find its way eastward over the various railroads that connect them, across the Mississippi river with the country east of them, to the eastern States, require that authority should be granted to companies to bridge the Mississippi river. I do not think there is the slightest incompatibility between the navigation of the Mississippi river and the commercial interests of the railroads, provided a bill shall be passed properly guarded, as I believe the bill now under the consideration of the Senate is.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa whether, from his knowledge of the river, the current where the boats pass does not change from time to time, and then, further, whether provision is made in this bill to secure the building of the piers so as to meet that contingency.

Mr. GRIMES. The current does change sometimes during the season of floods in the spring, but any company that owns a bridge will see to it that the piers are so arranged that the current will run through their draw. I have had a little experience in this question of currents myself. Sometimes the river threatens to leave a town on the banks; it becomes necessary, therefore, for the corporate authorities or individuals to throw in obstructions above, so as to cause a set of the current to run by the landing or levee of the village where it was originally, and which it has threatened to leave. They had a very good illustration of that in the city of St. Louis. St. Louis, a few years ago, was threatened to be left entirely away from the river; but by the expenditure of some thousands of dollars, I do not know how many, by putting in obstructions, stopping the flow of the current on the Illinois side, they caused the current to flow back, along down on the Missouri side, so as to make their landing a great deal better than it was before the river threatened to leave them. The railroad company will see to it that the channel is through their draw.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have here the opinion of Captain Blakely, a gentleman of long experience in the navigation of the Mississippi river, who gives this as his opinion:

"The draw, if one is built, should be made as wide as is practicable to build and have it answer a good purpose for the railroad, say no less than one hundred and fifty feet in the clear between the center pier and the pier on which the end of the draw rests when closed, and if found practicable, no less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in the clear."

Captain W. F. Davidson, who has been a long and successful navigator on the upper Mississippi, says:

"I think section two of the bill"—

Alluding to one of the railroad bridge bills sent to him—

"should be amended by forcing the company to build a draw" considering that less obstructive than a bridge with continuous spans.

But, Mr. President, we did not feel at liberty to report against the allowance of bridges, and in many respects thought it advantageous to seize this opportunity of regulating them. I would, however, at the same time, desire that Congress should create a commission, authorize the President or Secretary of War to send a commission to survey the whole river, and decide, at least as to the future, what should be the character of the bridges there. The probability is that before the close of the next session of Congress you will be compelled to authorize a dozen of these bridges. The thing will get to be serious when they come to be so numerous as that. I think we have guarded this bill as well as, with the light before us, it was possible for us to do; and yet I should like when this extensive building of bridges on the Mississippi river is entered upon, to have the opinion of a board of scientific engineers; and with that view, some days since I introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, but they have not seen fit to return it yet with a report. I feel reluctant to vote for any other bridge than the one reported by the Post Office Committee in this bill, simply because it is but one; though I have no particular objection to any other except as to the number; but I hope that when this bill passes we shall authorize a commission to be sent to survey the river and determine and settle the essential points to be guarded in the construction of these bridges; how, where at the same time the railroads may be accommodated, the navigation shall be preserved. It is of great importance, not only to us, but to the whole country, that this should be done. My resolution, to which I have referred, and which was introduced some days ago, was in this language:

"That the Secretary of War be directed to appoint a commission, to consist of three officers of the corps of Engineers of the Army, to examine and report at the present session of Congress, if practicable, and if not, before the next session of Congress, upon the subject of the construction of railroad bridges across the Mississippi river at such localities and upon such plans of construction as will offer the least impediment to the navigation of the river; and that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of said commission."

I should very much prefer, before very many bridges are authorized, that this commission should be sent out to view the river, and furnish us the best information on the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That a bridge may be constructed at the town of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, so as to connect the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad with the Pike County and Great Western railroads of Illinois, on the same terms, and subject to the same restrictions, as contained in this act for the construction of the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment does not provide who is to construct the bridge; it does not authorize any particular parties to construct the bridge. It says that a bridge may be built there. Do you mean to authorize the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company to build it?

Mr. HENDERSON. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who is to build it?

Mr. HENDERSON. The amendment says that it may be built under the same terms and subject to the same restrictions as the bridge at Quincy; that is, it is to be built by a company appointed by the two States of Missouri and Illinois. It is to be done by an independent company; it cannot be built by the railroad company.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the second section of the bill by striking out, in lines thirty-eight and thirty-nine, the words, "whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent span of said bridge;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draws after the passage of trains.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see why these words should be struck out. The Senator from Minnesota has charge of the bill, and I call his attention to the proposed amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why should the bridge company be required to open the draw when there is no occasion for it? Why open the draw for a vessel that can pass under the permanent spans?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state my reason for offering this amendment in a very few words. The proviso now requires that the—

Draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same.

It strikes me that if these draw-bridges be built there will be controversy between the boatmen and bridge owners in regard to the necessity of opening the draws. At certain stages of water on the sides of the draws a certain class of boats may pass under the permanent spans. There will be permanent spans on either side; the bill requires them. A small boat comes along that is not more than thirty or forty feet high, or, perhaps, a boat that is not more than twenty feet, or ten feet, if you please. It wants to pass through the draw, and the owners of the bridge declare that there is no necessity for opening the draw; that the boat may very well pass beneath the permanent span. Who is to settle the controversy between the boatman and the owners of the bridge as to whether, upon proper signal, the draw shall be opened or not? If boats can pass under the span they will give no signal; if they cannot, they will give the signal; and why should not the bridge owners open the draw when the signal is given?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bridge company would certainly act at their peril. The boats are not to be constructed with that view. The provision is "that said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge."

Mr. HENDERSON. Who is to determine the question as to whether the construction of the boats is such that they may pass?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly the bridge company would act at their peril. If they did not open the draw, and the construction of the boat was such that any damage was done, they would clearly be responsible.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose the only remedy the boatman would have if the draw was not opened and he was forced to undertake a passage between the piers of the bridge, under the permanent spans, would be to sue the bridge company. Then I suppose the long, the everlasting controversy which has been had in regard to the Rock Island bridge, as to whether it is an obstruction or not, would be renewed for trial in the courts; or there would be a similar controversy, whether the particular boat could pass through or not.

Mr. RAMSEY. If you allow bridges with the draw at all, it is in the interest of the public that they should be taxed as little as possible; that is, that they should not be required to open the draw on any unnecessary occasion. Of course, a boat that cannot pass the permanent spans must pass through in this way; but it is desirable that the draw should be opened as little as possible and on no unnecessary occasion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not profess to know a great deal about these subjects; but it strikes me that the words which I have moved to strike out ought not to be in the law. I do not want a controversy between the bridge owners and the steamboat men in regard to this matter. I do not suppose that a steamboat man will give a signal unless he wants the draw to be opened. I apprehend that if he can pass under the permanent spans he would not require the draw to be opened, he would scarcely put the bridge owners to that trouble. As the bill now stands it will leave the bridge owners to open the draw or not just as they choose. Of course it will be at their peril, but only subject to a suit; that is all at last. I suppose damages might be recovered, provided the steamboat man could show that his boat was of such construction as to require that the draw should be opened, but look to the field there will be for the admission of testimony on both sides. It may be said by competent steamboat men that if the pilot had understood his duty he might have passed under the permanent spans without injury to his boat notwithstanding his boat has been destroyed; that the construction of that particular boat was such as to have admitted it to pass under the permanent spans. I think it is better to have this provision out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will inquire of the gentleman reporting this bill, what is the meaning of the fourth section? What is the necessity for it?

Mr. RAMSEY. We accepted the fourth section as we found it in the bill as referred to us. It reads as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the ferry authorized to be established by the Illinois and Missouri Transportation Company, by the laws of the States of Illinois and Missouri, across the Mississippi river at the city of Quincy, shall, during the time so authorized by the laws of the States aforesaid, and until the completion of said bridge, under and according to the provisions of this act, be and the same is hereby declared, recognized, and known as a post route.

I understand it only refers to a transit across the river at that point now. We found it as a section in the bill referred to us, and as we knew of no reason why it should be stricken out we allowed it to remain in the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe that is about all there is in it. The States of Missouri and Illinois have at this point authorized a ferry. Nearly all the ferries over the Mississippi, and I do not know but all of them, are authorized by the joint acts of the Legislatures of the different States bordering upon the river. The object of this section is to make this ferry a post road. I suppose all roads of this kind, all the great highways of the country ought to be post roads. We say every session in a post-route bill that such and such roads, leading so and so, from one place to another, are declared to be post roads; and I do not imagine there can be any objection to this ferry being made a post road.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose there is no objection, then, to letting the section be stricken out. I do not like this way of Congress legislating advantages to a particular ferry company across the Mississippi river. I do not see any necessity for it. I do not know anything about this ferry company at Quincy; I do not know an individual connected with it; but the State of Missouri and the State of Illinois might desire to charter another ferry company across the Mississippi river, and I think that this section would affect that ferry, if it were authorized, perhaps injuriously.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How? This is not exclusive.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose the company named in the section do not discharge the duties enjoined upon them by the act of incorporation from the Legislatures of Missouri and Illinois, but they claim the right to take the mail across; that this is a postal route, and they claim the right to continue their ferry, under this act of Congress, notwithstanding their violation of the laws of the State of Missouri and of the State of Illinois. What effect would this act then have, I will inquire of the Senator from Illinois? I suppose that the charter may be forfeited by their failure to comply with the terms and conditions upon which it was granted, and the States respectively might desire to incorporate another company that would behave better in the future. Then what effect would this section have? I presume no other ferry company would be authorized to take the mails across; and the effect of this provision—I do not suppose it is intended in that way—would be to override the State laws and to make this a postal route, notwithstanding the effort on the part of the Legislatures of Illinois and Missouri to establish another ferry. I ask the Senator if that would not be the effect, or whether it could have any other effect.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am surprised at the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. HENDERSON. I know you are always surprised.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps I do not understand it, but surely I am surprised at the inquiry. I cannot conceive how this can interfere with any other company. I am not for it if it can have any such effect. If it is to be an exclusive right to establish ferries on the part of Illinois and Missouri at this or any other point, I am opposed to all such legislation. I do not understand it in any such way. How it could possibly have such an effect I do not know.

Mr. HENDERSON. I expressly excepted it from the intention of the Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How the section can give any exclusive privileges I am at a loss to conceive. But the Senator is aware that in order to take the mail over any of the common roads of the country, we make them post roads. We provide, for instance, "that the road from Hannibal to Palmyra, in Missouri, is hereby declared to be a post route."

Mr. HENDERSON. That is now a post route; the route itself is a post route. Then what is the necessity for this provision?

Mr. TRUMBULL. But there is no post route, I suppose, from Quincy across the river.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir, there is; it is now a post route.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware of it.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no doubt about it. I am not aware of any legislation of Congress making a particular ferry company or its boats a post route. This is the first legislation of that character I ever heard of, and I have been on the Post Office Committee for some years. It is common to declare the line of road between two certain States a postal route; but I am not aware of any such provision as this existing in any law of Congress. I have never seen anything of the sort. From Quincy to Palmyra, and from Palmyra on to St. Jo. is now a post route, and it can do no harm to strike out this section. The Senator of course does not wish to vest this ferry company with any peculiar or special privileges. I protest that I know nothing in respect to this company; but I think it is bad legislation to commence on the part of Congress to select any particular ferry company, and to declare that that company as now established shall be a postal route, because it may bring up a conflict with the laws of the respective States. The Senator will readily see that it may do so. The section can have no beneficial effect as it now stands, and therefore I ask that it be stricken out, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see that it can have any injurious effect. When I expressed surprise at the amendment, the Senator rather rebuked me for that; but I really do not see how the section can have such an effect as the Senator supposes. What is a ferry? What do the law-books call a ferry? It is a highway, nothing else. A ferry is just as much a highway as a turnpike road; and I can see why there might be a necessity for a ferry being a post route. You cannot compel the mails to be taken across the river. I am not aware of any law that makes a ferry across the river a post route. If there is such a law, I am not aware of it. The Senator says there is a law already in existence making a post route from Quincy to Palmyra and to Hannibal.

Mr. HENDERSON. How would the mails be carried, otherwise, across the river?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know whether there is a provision of that kind; there may be; that would embrace this very line of road. I do not know who compose this ferry company; the Senator is as well informed in reference to that as I am; but here is a ferry already authorized by the two States of Illinois and Missouri. If it is not, the section would not amount to anything. The bill recites the fact that there is such a ferry authorized there. Now, what possible objection can there be to making that ferry, until the bridge shall be completed, a post route? I see nothing exclusive in it. It seems to me it is perfectly proper that there should be a ferry there to transport the mails, and that it should be a post route. How that will interfere with any other company I cannot conceive.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know any reason why this section is inserted here; and unless there is some explanation of it given I shall vote to strike it out. I can imagine this case: suppose there has been an old ferry company at Quincy, and the mails are transported by that old company—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I asked the question, if there was such a company.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know; but unless we have some further knowledge on this subject I think we ought to strike this section out. If the parties interested have not seen fit to enlighten anybody so that we can obtain information on the subject the section ought not to be here. Suppose, I say, there had been an old company established there that carried the mail, and other parties have gone recently and secured a charter from Illinois and Missouri for a new ferry company, to be called the Illinois and Missouri Transportation Company, may they not now seek, perhaps, by this section to declare that that company, and that section—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not "that only."

Mr. GRIMES. Well, that that shall be the post route.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A post route.

Mr. GRIMES. Well, a post route; that that shall be declared, recognized, and known as a post route. They may then set up a claim that the mail shall not be transported by any other company.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know but that they could do it under this section.

Mr. HENDERSON. They can do it after the passage of this act.

Mr. GRIMES. Unless some satisfactory explanation can be given why this section is here, I think the Senator from Illinois ought not to ask us to adopt it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not for the life of me see how the making of a ferry a post route is any more dangerous than making a bridge a post route. That is the very object of the bill. All these bridges are declared to be post routes when built. Does anybody suppose that the declaring of these bridges post routes, as this bill does—

Mr. HENDERSON. This is not a bridge.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am speaking of the bridges. Does anybody suppose that the declaring them post routes gives these particular bridge companies an exclusive right, and prevents other bridges from being built? If I supposed so, I would not vote for the bill. How does a ferry differ from a bridge? If it is proper to have a post route, I ask the Senator from Missouri why it is not proper that a ferry should be a post route until the bridge is built. That is the provision here. I do not wish to take up time about it. I suppose that the parties who prepared the bill—it was not prepared by me—who contemplate building this bridge, wanted to use their ferry until they got the bridge constructed; and that is the provision here. I do not suppose it is intended, and I do not see how it can interfere with any other company.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator, as a lawyer, if this provision shall be adopted can any other ferry company at Quincy take the mails of the United States across from Quincy opposite to Westminster?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly it can if it is a post route.

Mr. HENDERSON. But it will not be a post route without the legislation of Congress. The Senator says that he did not draw the bill. I am very well aware of that, and I suppose the Senator, like myself, knows nothing about this ferry company; but I do not wish any particular ferry company now established by the laws of Missouri and Illinois to be legalized into being as the only post route at that town until this bridge shall be built. It may be forty or fifty years before the bridge is built, and other ferry companies may be incorporated by Illinois and Missouri. Why is it that this company shall be constituted the only post route at that point?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have tried to explain to the Senator that it is not so to be declared. I do not know that there is any especial importance in the section, and I do not wish to have any controversy about it; but for the life of me I cannot see why the Senator will persist that this is the only post route. If there is no post route there, ought there not to be one? I have no more to say about it. I care nothing about it. I have no interest in it one way or the other, further than to authorize these great lines of travel to accommodate themselves to each other. I think the time has come when we have got to have bridges.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is possible that this bill will occupy all day if we proceed with it, and therefore I think we had better take up the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have nothing further to say about it. Let the Senate dispose of it as they think proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri moves to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is one vote that I feel I ought to have on this bill. I do not intend to argue it. I argued the question a day or two ago. It is in reference to draw-bridges or continuous-span bridges. I desire to make a motion in that regard, as my constituents in Missouri have requested of me to do so. I do not see fit to read the documents that I have received on the subject from various towns on the Mississippi river, and from individuals, engineers and others, and steamboat men on this subject, as I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate. Suffice it to say that I have been requested by a very large number of individuals, commercial bodies, &c., in my State to resist the construction upon the Mississippi river of any bridges except continuous-span bridges.

It is the opinion of some Senators here that draw-bridges can be constructed so as to be of less obstruction to navigation than continuous span bridges. The Senate will remember that two years ago we authorized the building of a bridge at Steubenville. The late lamented Senator from Vermont (Judge Collamer) was at that time chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. He reported a bill for the building of that bridge at Steubenville, the fourth section of which provided for the construction of any bridges on the Ohio river, and required that the continuous spans, if the bridges were built with continuous spans, should be three hundred feet in length. I remember that when the late Senator from Vermont reported the bill, he stated that if individuals wanted to construct such bridges they might attempt it, but his belief was that no such bridge could be built; that it was an utter impossibility. I learn from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that a bridge has been constructed at Steubenville ninety feet high, and with a continuous span of three hundred feet, and that it is operating well; that the railroads are using it, and drawing across it the largest freight trains; that there is no difficulty whatever. It is true the bridge cost a good deal of money, about $900,000; but it is said to be one of the most substantial and permanent structures ever built in this country; it is a piece of bridge architecture perfectly wonderful in itself.

Inasmuch as it has been demonstrated by the construction of that bridge that the views and opinions of individuals a few years ago were not correct, and that a bridge of that character can be constructed, I think it would be better to adopt the continuous-span project on the Mississippi river. My impression is, that it is of less obstruction to the river than draw-bridges. At least, that is the view of all who have written to me on the subject. In all the communications that I have received since this subject was introduced here, and since my colleague introduced a proposition to bridge the Mississippi river at St. Louis, I have not received one that did not express a preference for a continuous-span bridge. It is not impracticable anywhere. I know it was said in 1862, when the bill for the Steubenville bridge was passed, that it was perfectly impracticable anywhere. There are always any number of arguments to be adduced as to the impossibility of a project. A bridge constructor remarked the other day, I think very forcibly and aptly, that there was no impossibility with the American people; that he had ceased to suppose that there was any impossibility. When the Senator talks about the impossibility of a construction of this character, I think he misses the mark. I am not disposed to think that the inventive genius of the American people will now fail them. Four years ago we thought it was an utter impossibility to build a bridge across the Ohio river with a span of three hundred feet, but the thing has been done. Everybody says now that it is a perfect success. There is no objection to building such a bridge across the Mississippi river. It can be constructed without any doubt.

But in order to test that one question, without making any extended argument on the subject, because I know the Senator from Ohio is very anxious to get up the Post Office appropriation bill, I move, in the fourteenth and fifteenth lines of the second section, after the word "act," to strike out all down to the word "bridge" in the eighteenth line. The clause now reads in this way:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot, or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans it shall not be of less elevation, &c.

If my motion should be adopted it will read thus:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, and it shall not be of less elevation, &c.

That will strike out that portion of the section which leaves it discretionary with the company organized under this bill to build draw-bridges, and it simply brings up the question as to whether draw-bridges shall be built on the Mississippi river or not. That is the plain, naked question. If my proposition should be adopted it disposes of the draw-bridges, and all bridges built must be built with continuous spans.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume that amendment is not now in order. It is an amendment to an amendment of the committee which, I understand, has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to an amendment already agreed to, striking out and inserting, and will not be in order until the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was not aware that that amendment of the committee had been agreed to. I will wait until the bill is reported to the Senate, and will then offer the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to alter one of those amendments, and I suppose that this is the proper time to do it, before we concur in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The better course will be to have the amendments on which a separate vote is required by any Senator excepted, and to take the question on concurring in all the other amendments to which there is no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to alter one of the amendments of the committee in order to carry out the purpose of the gentleman who has charge of the bill. It is in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth lines of the amendment to the second section. The clause now reads:

And with spans of not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw.

The Senator from Minnesota means that from the center of the pivot; but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] thinks it is not susceptible of that construction. The intention is to have an opening of at least one hundred and fifty feet in the clear. I therefore move to amend that amendment in the twenty-ninth line by striking out the words "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty," and after the word "length" inserting the words "in the clear;" so that it will read:

And with spans of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw.

That is what the Senator from Minnesota intends it shall be; but I think in the way it stands now there might be a controversy about it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should very much prefer if the opening between the piers on either side of the pivot pier was two hundred feet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But that is not what you meant.

Mr. RAMSEY. One hundred and fifty feet is the least that I would assent to. The advantage would be very little in favor of that here. From the center pier would be about twenty feet. The other piers, at least they are so at the top, where the superstructure rests upon the pier at Rock Island, are about eight feet. Now you subtract about one half of each of those end piers and the whole of the center pier, and you do not have much above one hundred and fifty feet. I should prefer having the advantage of one foot, and if the bridge can be built with that span, I should prefer it very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment that Senators are discussing is not now before the Senate. The question will be taken on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, excepting the amendment indicated by the Senator from Illinois, and the one indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. Both our amendments are to the same amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will then be taken on concurring in the other amendments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire also to except the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri for the building of a bridge at Hannibal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted. The question is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole with the exception of those indicated.

The remaining amendments were then concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment to the second section, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was after the enacting clause of the second section, to strike out the following words:

That any bridge built under the authority of this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the erection of the bridge, of not less than three hundred feet in length; and said span shall not be less than thirty feet above the low-water mark, and not less than ten feet above the extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge; and one of the next adjoining spans shall not be less than two hundred feet in length; and, also, that there shall be a pivot draw constructed in said bridge, at an accessible and navigable point, with spans of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided, also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet; and said spans shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark, and not less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, nearing to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to amend the amendment in the twenty-ninth line, by striking out the words "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty;" and after the word "length" inserting "in the clear;" so that the clause will read:

And with spans of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier in the draw.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope very much that that amendment will not be adopted. I was not disposed to submit, if I could prevent it, to the construction of draw-bridges upon the Mississippi river at all. I have stated how sensitive my constituents feel on that subject. This bill was clearly drawn with the idea that the openings in the clear should be one hundred and seventy-five feet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, that was not the understanding.

Mr. RAMSEY. They were not expected to be that in the clear. They were to be one hundred and fifty feet. I understood that the parties in interest were willing to accept this modification, and the bill was so reported. We were aware that by this phraseology we would gain a few feet in the opening, which was desirable. Of course if the Senate determine that it shall not exceed one hundred and fifty feet, the amendment will be agreeable to them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated a day or two ago that the navigation of this river was to be changed almost entirely in its character. My impression is that in the course of a year or two the steamers that are now running upon the river will be changed entirely to tug-boats and barges, and hence my desire is to have as wide openings as we possibly can have, if bridges are to be constructed upon this river at all. My recollection is that one of the draws at the Rock Island bridge is one hundred and seventeen feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. They are one hundred and seventeen and one hundred and twelve feet.

Mr. HENDERSON. In the clear?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. It may be said that it is owing to the rapidity of the current there that so much property has been destroyed; but let me tell Senators, you cannot build a bridge on the Mississippi river that that very same difficulty will not come up, provided you do not have wider draws than are proposed here. In very high water the currents change, and it is an utter impossibility to pass through. These piers will have to be very large. If the boats have a large number of barges, or the boats are very wide, or the number of boats that are to be taken through occupy a large quantity of room on the river, it will be an utter impossibility to pass between the piers without striking them and destroying a part of the cargo. It has been and is now exceedingly perilous and dangerous to life at times to pass through that one hundred and seventeen feet draw at Rock Island.

I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that a draw had been built in France with an opening much larger than this. Is it possible, I submit to the Senate, to build a bridge with a draw of one hundred and seventy-five feet? If so, there is no stream on God's earth that requires this width of draw more than the Mississippi river. It is a great stream, and it is a rich country that lies upon it. We in the West desire to preserve the navigation of that river, and I think the Senator from Illinois ought not to consent to any rule of construction that will obstruct in the future the navigation of this stream. He is as much interested in it as I am. I know that he feels as deep an interest in it as I do; and so does the Senator from Iowa. I do not put myself forward as the champion of the navigation of this river. I do not feel that I have any interest in it more than they have; but I do insist that now when we are laying the foundation of this system, because what we do here will be done for all time in the construction of bridges over that great stream, every precaution should be taken to secure the navigation. It is a stream having twenty-five hundred miles of navigation, the best stream for navigable purposes, perhaps, on the face of the earth, considering its length, and the country is just beginning to be developed, as it were. Take that immense country north of St. Louis and that must pour in upon the surface of that stream immense quantities of the products of the earth, in time to come, and manufactures and everything that can employ the industry of man. We all know that the transportation upon the surface of that river will not cost the people one third of the cost of transportation by railroad lines. While we are doing so much for the railroad companies, can we not do something also for the continued full navigation of this great river.

In the State of Missouri we have constructed steamers that take the cars across the river at St. Charles. No bridge has been built there, but a train of cars is run upon the boat and carried across immediately, without much obstruction; and that might be done on the Mississippi river; but gentlemen say no, they must have bridges. A bill is introduced here for the purpose of constructing them, and, as I understood, with spans of one hundred and seventy-five feet. I was opposed to draw-bridges entirely; I wanted spans of three hundred feet; but gentlemen insist on pivot bridges, and as I supposed, with spans of one hundred and seventy-five feet. I had a conversation with the gentlemen engaged in the construction of this bridge, and I told them that I desired the spans to be two hundred feet. They said one hundred and seventy-five feet in the clear was as much as they could stand, but they could construct a bridge with that span. Now, it is deliberately proposed this morning, when we are about to pass the bill, to reduce that width to one hundred and fifty feet.

I warn gentlemen who are just as much interested in this subject as I am, that they are doing a thing this morning that they will regret in the future. I am sure of it. I see a disposition to pass this bill, and why? Because of a desire to do what it is supposed will facilitate communication. We ought to adopt the glorious mean in this thing. I am willing to give the railroad companies on the east side of the river the facility of communication to the western bank; but I desire that the Senate in doing that shall not neglect the communication upon this great river itself. They should remember that they are interfering with that navigation which is much better for the people than any transportation they can get by railroad.

Mr. GRIMES. But that takes the transportation in the wrong direction.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will not do to close up the existing direction, if the people desire so to send the products of their farms. I know that that is to have its influence; but if gentlemen desire to insist on the change of direction and that the cargo shall go to the East, and they feel disposed to close up a great river like the Mississippi simply in order to change the direction, when that new direction costs at least four times as much, I will not make any further complaint, but I do think that if a bridge can be constructed with a span of one hundred and seventy-five feet it should be done.

The Senator who has charge of this bill says it can be done; that much wider spans have been built; it is possible to build them. Then let American genius go to work and construct such bridges here. It has been done in France; American workmen can do what French workmen can do. It has been done in England; American workmen can do whatever English workmen can do. If it is required for the commerce of France, it is demanded for the commerce of our great West. If it is demanded in any part of England for the commerce of England, it is as much demanded for the increasing and growing commerce of the people of the United States.

There is no reason why as great advantages should not be given here as are given elsewhere. If the railroad companies can construct such bridges, let them do it, and then you will have the advantages of communication both by railroad and by water. I sincerely hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. RAMSEY. I thought the amendment was withdrawn. What is it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is to strike out "one hundred and seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" and insert "in the clear" after "feet." It carries out precisely what was meant.

Mr. RAMSEY. The gain is so little to the bridge company that I do not think it necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It makes what is meant clear.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not at all astonished that the Senator from Missouri should be as tenacious on this subject as he is, because he is representing, as he says, the sentiment of the State of Missouri, the head and front of which is the city St. Louis, that is anxious that the whole northwestern country should be tributary exclusively to that particular city. Now, Mr. President, it so happens that a portion of my constituents who live in that Northwest of which the Senator spoke, and for whom I profess to be able to speak as well as the Senator can speak, are not only anxious sometimes to go to St. Louis, but they are anxious to have facilities for reaching the eastern cities; and they want, if they possibly can, to be able to do so in the winter, when the ice is running, when it is impossible to cross sometimes for weeks in succession without great risk of life; and they want an opportunity when they choose to send their freight and their live stock to the only market they have without breaking bulk at the Mississippi river.

Now, sir, the Senator says that the proposition which comes from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ought not to be adopted, because it does not give sufficient opportunity for boats to pass. Who is to judge of that? Did not the gentleman representing the committee read to us the opinion of three Army engineers detailed to go out and examine the Rock Island bridge? Did they not state specifically in that report the objections to the Rock Island bridge, and that it was solely because the piers were not placed parallel with the current of the stream? Have not the committee modified this bill so as to correspond with the report which these engineer officers made? Is not that the best information we can obtain? As I understand it, this bill is predicated upon that report. It is brought in here by a gentleman who is as much interested in the navigation of the Mississippi river as any man can possibly be who occupies a seat on this floor. He is at the very head of the navigation of the Mississippi river. His individual interests and the interests of his neighbors would probably be against the construction of any bridge anywhere on the Mississippi. He has told us that his prejudices and prepossessions were all in opposition to the construction of any bridge. But yet even he, under these circumstances, after having thoroughly investigated the whole subject, after having read the report of these three Army engineers, recommends the Senate to pass this bill.

Mr. President, I need not say that my colleague and myself, who live on the Mississippi river, and who represent several tolerably important commercial towns, are deeply interested in the navigation of the river; and I would not, and I am satisfied that he would not, do a single thing here or elsewhere that could by any possibility obstruct the free navigation of that river; and I am not disposed to rest under the imputation which might be inferred from the remarks of the Senator from Missouri that we would obstruct the navigation. We are deeply interested in it. We want for the present time, and we want all future ages, to have uninterrupted navigation of the stream; but we want at the same time, if it can be done, and we are satisfied that it can be done, opportunities to get eastward as well as southward and northward. We want to be able to transport our produce and ourselves with as little inconvenience as possible to the eastern markets; and that is the reason why we insist that these railroad companies shall have an opportunity to bridge the Mississippi river, provided they do so without interfering in any degree with the navigation of the stream. The Post Office Committee having investigated the whole subject, predicated their report upon the opinion of three skillful Army engineers who were sent out there for the purpose of investigating the subject of bridges across the Mississippi river, have submitted us a bill, and for that I vote, and for that I trust a majority of the Senate will vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am sorry that my friend from Iowa should have thought that I was making any imputations upon him or the Senator from Minnesota. I distinctly stated that both of them were as much interested in the navigation of this river as I could possibly be; but the Senator seems to think that I made some imputations on them, or that the effect of what I said might have that bearing. I think not. I certainly did not intend my language in that way, and I am perfectly sure that no such construction can be properly put upon it. He seems to think that, occupying the position that I do, living in Missouri and looking to my constituents there for sentiment upon this subject, and the State of Missouri having the great city of St. Louis in it, of course it is not astonishing that I should take the ground I do. If the Senator thinks that I am adverse to the interest of any town in Iowa or any town in New England, he is very much mistaken. If he supposes that I would knowingly do any act as a Senator here that should tend to build up a town in my own State to the prejudice or to the injury of another, when that act required a wrong on my part, I can state to the Senator that I would be very far from doing any such thing. It is true that I am a Senator from Missouri; I look to the interests of the people whom I represent; and none, I think, ever looked more closely to the interests of his own constituents than the Senator from Iowa. I never blame the Senator for it. He has a perfect right to do so; and he ought not to blame me for standing by the interests of the people of Missouri.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not cast any censure on the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Iowa is sadly mistaken, if he thinks I could be induced to step aside from my duty to the injury or expense of the people of any State of the Union. I do not desire to do it, and I would not do it. He says the Senator representing the committee on this question has recommended this amendment. I do not understand that the Senator from Minnesota recommends any such thing. The bill as it now stands provides that:

If any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on either side of the central or pivot-pier of the draw.

That, of course, is the length in the clear.

And the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet.

If the Senator from Minnesota will say that it is his intention to reduce the width of the spans to one hundred and fifty feet, I will take back what I have said in reference to my opinions as to the construction of the bill; but I never doubted the construction of the bill. If the Senator from Illinois will allow the bill to pass as it stands, I am satisfied with it; but he moves this amendment; and the Senator from Iowa says that the gentleman having charge of the bill on behalf of the committee insists upon the amendment. I have not so understood the Senator from Minnesota, who read a steamboat man's letter declaring that the passage of vessels required one hundred and seventy-five feet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Minnesota will allow me to make a suggestion. We ought not to take up time, I think, in a disagreement as to what we mean. The Senator from Minnesota has stated once or twice that he did not intend the bill as the Senator from Missouri understands it, that the opening was to be one hundred and seventy-five feet on the clear, but he understands that there is to come out of this length of one hundred and seventy-five feet whatever the draw rests upon on the piers, which he thought would make it a little more than one hundred and fifty feet. I have consulted the Senator from Minnesota, and he is willing to make it specific by saying that the opening shall not be less than one hundred and fifty-five feet. Then there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will compromise with the Senator from Illinois if he will put it at one hundred and sixty feet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, I will agree to that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well, Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If my friend from Missouri will cease talking we can take a vote. I modify my amendment so as to make the provision read:

And with openings of not less than one hundred and sixty feet wide in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois as thus modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish now to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Minnesota to the first portion of the second section of the bill as it has been amended on the motion of the committee, and I desire to suggest an amendment to it, to which I hope they will consent. It now declares:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridges shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

If these bridges are to be built as continuous-span bridges, I think it ought to be more specifically stated how they shall be constructed. I propose, therefore, in lieu of this language, to make it read:

That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed with continuous and unbroken spans, it shall not be less than fifty feet above high-water mark as understood at the point of its erection, measuring for such elevation from the surface of the water and such high stage to the bottom chord of the bridge. The main span of such bridge shall be made to cover the main channel of the river.

There is no such declaration in the bill now, but the bridge company may build the main span where they choose, are not compelled to build it over the main channel of the river:

And such span shall not be less than three hundred feet in length.

I suppose this will have to be altered to two hundred and fifty feet if the Senators insist on that width.

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not insist on the spans being only two hundred and fifty feet, but I have the opinion here of an engineer attached to the War Department. He says:

"In regard to the question of the economy and practicability of truss bridges for railroads, I have the honor to state that, in my judgment, spans of two hundred and fifty feet in the clear are as great as should be adopted for crossing navigable rivers."

They are the extent of spans over almost all the rivers with which we are familiar. The spans of the great bridge crossing the Susquehanna river, now in process of erection, are two hundred and fifty feet. It is desirable, of course, to have them three hundred feet if the Senate think they can be constructed of that width.

Mr. HENDERSON. Every bridge on the Ohio river is built with three hundred feet by the law I have before me.

Mr. RAMSEY. How many bridges are there on the Ohio?

Mr. HENDERSON. Here is a general law, pages 289, 290 of the Session Acts of 1861-62, and no continuous-span bridge can be built with less than three hundred feet on that river.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the width of the Ohio river where the bridge is erected? There is but one on the river, I think, now built.

Mr. HENDERSON. There are several bridges on the river that have not been built under this law; and they have led to continual controversies in the courts of the United States on the subject.

Mr. RAMSEY. In a narrow stream, of course, it is easily thrown at a very high elevation, but the Mississippi is wider than the Ohio river.

Mr. HENDERSON. That does not apply to the spans of the bridge. A span of three hundred feet can be built on the Mississippi just as well as on the Ohio. There may be some difficulty about getting the elevation, but that has nothing to do with the span the Senator will see. I want to put these spans, if they are built in this way, three hundred feet instead of two hundred and fifty.

I suggest further that it ought also be amended so as to have the main span of the bridge, if they are built of continuous spans, immediately over the best or main channel of the river. There is no requirement of that particular in the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to that at all. I cannot conceive what motive the company would have to build the main passage-way over any other than the main channel.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume so; but why does the Senator require it in the draw-bridges and not in continuous-span bridges?

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. My amendment goes on:

The main span of such bridge shall be made to cover the main channel of said river, and shall be three hundred feet in length, and the next adjoining span not less than two hundred and twenty feet; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

I should like, also, to have a provision of this character:

No span of any such bridge beneath which water flows at low-water mark shall be less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the amendment proposed? Where does it come in?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is where the committee amend the bill, beginning at line seventeen of section two:

Provided, That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed with continuous and unbroken spans, it shall not be less than fifty feet above the high-water mark as understood at the point of its erection, measuring for such elevation from the surface of the water at such high stage to the bottom chord of the bridge.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is precisely what it is now except in different words.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to amend it; I prefer the different words:

The main span of such bridge shall be made to cover the main channel of said river.

There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I provide that no main spans shall be less than three hundred feet in length, and also to shorten the next adjoining spans so as to be not less than two hundred and twenty feet in length, "and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel to the current of river." I think the wording of it is much better and it contains an important provision which is left out of the bill as it stands.

Mr. RAMSEY. You are reducing the length of the spans from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and twenty feet.

Mr. HENDERSON. There certainly can be no objection to that.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to the enlargement of the main span to three hundred feet, but I object to the reduction of the other spans from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and twenty feet.

Mr. HENDERSON. I only ask that the one over the main channel shall be three hundred feet; two hundred and twenty feet is enough for the adjoining span. I do not care for a larger one if you have a three hundred feet span over the main channel of the river; but the Senator may put it at two hundred and fifty feet if he will. I did not know the Senator would be willing to agree to that; but if he is, I am perfectly willing that all the spans shall be two hundred and fifty feet except the main span, and let that be three hundred feet. That will cover any water running at low-water mark wherever the water runs at low-water mark.

Mr. RAMSEY. While I agree to accept the provision requiring the main span to be three hundred feet, I object to the deduction of the others from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and twenty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to make a suggestion. He has copied out of a statute passed some time ago a little different phraseology from that employed in this bill. I really do not think it is any better than that in the bill which the Senator from Minnesota has reported, and which provides "that if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken or continuous spans"—the Senator proposes to amend by changing the order of the words "unbroken" and "continuous," so as to read "that if the said bridge shall be made with continuous and unbroken spans." I do not think there is much importance, in an amendment of that kind, which adjective comes first. The only point of his amendment, as it seems to me, is that the wide span shall be over the center of the stream, and to that I understand the Senator from Minnesota has no objection; I certainly have none. If the Senator from Missouri will just put his amendment into form, I think we can agree upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is in form now:

That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed with continuous and unbroken spans—

Certainly that cannot be different from "unbroken and continuous."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know; but there is no importance in amending the bill to change the order of those words.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was a mere oversight of mine if I have changed the order in which they come:

It shall not be less than fifty feet above high-water mark as understood at the point of its erection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here it is "as understood at the point of location." There is no importance in that change of language.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose not; but my amendment goes on, "measuring for such elevation from the surface of the water at such high stage to the bottom chord of the bridge."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here it is "to the bottom chord of the bridge."

Mr. HENDERSON. My amendment goes on, "and the main span of such bridge shall be made to cover the main channel of the river."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the new matter you propose to put in.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is there any objection to the three hundred feet span?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is assented to, I understand.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose that is not a matter of very great consequence, because, of course, all these bridges will now be built with a pivot pier. I suppose no company will build a bridge of this character when they can build one much cheaper with a pivot pier and draw. At any rate I will offer my amendment. I move to strike out all the words between "provided," in the seventeenth line, and "river," in the twenty-fourth line, and in lieu of those words to insert:

That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed with continuous and unbroken spans, it shall not be less than fifty feet above high-water mark as understood at the point of its erection, measuring for such elevation from the surface of the water at such high stage to the bottom chord of the bridge. The main span of such bridge shall be made to cover the main channel of the river, and such span shall not be less than three hundred feet in length, with also one of the next adjoining spans of not less than two hundred and fifty feet in length; and the piers of such bridges shall be parallel with the current of the river.

The question being put, it was declared that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I call for the yeas and nays. I thought the amendment was understood to be agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Saulsbury, and Sherman—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Ramsey, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Cra-gin, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Williams, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the second section, by inserting after the word "river," in line twenty-four, the words "and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river." There is no requirement in the bill now that the main span of the bridge shall be built over the channel or anywhere near the channel. I hope the Senate will permit this amendment to be made.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought perhaps there might be objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. At the same point, if the gentleman wishes to enlarge the main span to three hundred feet, he can propose it, and there will be no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is what I desired to accomplish, but the Senate just voted it down.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not that alone. The Senator incumbered that provision with a great deal of other matter which we did not want to adopt.

Mr. HENDERSON. There were but two points in my amendment which has just been voted down.

Mr. RAMSEY. The great objection to that amendment was, that it did not elevate the bridge sufficiently. It left out this provision of the section as it stands:

It shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is just what my amendment was; but I cannot go into a discussion of it with the Senator. I really want the best bridge I can get, and I will put the main span at three hundred feet. The amendment I move, therefore, is to insert after the word "river," in the twenty-fourth line of the second section, the words "and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and shall be not less than three hundred feet in length."

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I call the Senator's attention to the word "nearing," in the thirty-fourth line of the second section. It seems to me that it was certainly intended to be "measuring."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a clerical error which has been corrected, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That any bridge or bridges erected under and according to the provisions of this act shall be lawful structures, and shall be recognized and known as post routes, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation of the mails or troops and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile which the company or companies owning the railroads on each side of the river, and using said bridge, charge for the same service; and the officers and crews of all vessels, boats, and rafts navigating said river are required to regulate the width and the height of the same so as not to interfere with the erection or use of any bridge erected under the provisions of this act.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is that in lieu of section three?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I understand the amendment. Is it proposed to strike out section three?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; I have not made any such motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a part of this section already in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there is some other matter in this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would be very incongruous to repeat over again provisions already contained in the bill. A portion of this amendment is precisely what the third section is.

Mr. HENDERSON. That provision, I thought, could be stricken out afterward. I am not particular, however, about the amendment. If the Senator from Illinois objects to it, of course it will be voted down.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that there is a part of his amendment which would come in at the end of the third section, and perhaps he had better offer it in that form.

Mr. HENDERSON. I prefer the language as I have submitted it; but I do not wish to take up time, for I see that the Senate is impatient. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now before the Senate is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the second section as it has been amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another amendment made as in Committee of the Whole which was excepted and which will now be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That a bridge may be constructed at the town of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, across the Mississippi river, so as to connect the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad with the Pike County and Great Western railroads of Illinois, on the same terms and subject to the same restrictions as contained in this act for the construction of the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the title of the bill should be amended. It does not indicate what the bill is. I move to amend the title so as to read, "A bill to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and establishing them as post roads."

The amendment was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD—EASTERN DIVISION.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States recommending an extension of the time allowed by law for completing the first one hundred miles of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the message and documents with a joint resolution. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object. I have already yielded an hour and a half, and I insist upon the regular order of business.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, was read and passed to the second reading.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. WILSON. A day or two ago I offered a resolution to grant the use of this Hall to Mr. Murdoch for a reading for the benefit of the orphans of soldiers and sailors. I desire to take up the resolution and have the question settled whether we shall grant the use of the Hall or not, as the reading is to take place on Thursday, and the parties interested are exceedingly anxious to know whether the use of the Hall is to be granted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business. We can just as well decide in the morning the matter referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts as we can now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order having been laid aside informally by unanimous consent, must now come up, a call for it being made.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the following amendment, proposed by Mr. HENDERSON as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which persons have been or shall be appointed, either during the recess or during the session of the Senate, as assistant postmasters or other civil officers under the Government, whose appointments require the consent of the Senate, and whose appointments, having been submitted to the Senate, have been rejected or not consented to before the adjournment thereof, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury or used from any fund or appropriation made or created by law to pay the salaries of such persons under such appointments, or under any previous appointment to the same office, for services rendered after said adjournment. And if any such person so rejected by the Senate shall, after such adjournment, be appointed to the same office, no money shall be drawn or used as aforesaid to pay his salary until his appointment shall have been consented to by the Senate at its succeeding session.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Illinois has submitted an amendment to the bill, the language of which I like better than that, and therefore I withdraw the pending amendment, at least for the time being, until his amendment shall have been acted upon, though if I see fit I may propose it afterward with some change of language; I am not satisfied with it in its present shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing or undertaking to exercise or perform the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term, during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know the reasons why the honorable member from Illinois supposes a provision of that sort is constitutional. There was a period in the beginning of the Government when the President's power to remove was considered somewhat questionable. It was, however, decided by the Senate to be a clear power; and from that time to the present I do not know that the legality of the power has ever been questioned. Mr. Webster, many years ago, when there was a contest between the then President of the United States and the Senate—a contest just as angry or just as excited as the contest which may be supposed to exist now between a majority of the Senate and the President—was disposed to call in question the power of removal; but the Senate will find that, in a letter written by Mr. Madison, in the Papers we have recently published, in reply to Mr. Coles, who had been his former secretary, he enters into an argument on the subject and considers it a question no longer open for controversy. The Senate were very anxious at that time to prevent, if they could do it, the power which President Jackson was from time to time exercising, but they had to abandon it. I think the Supreme Court have more than once, the question being presented, recognized the power to remove, and they have done it even in relation to a judicial officer. The members of the judicial department of the Government provided by the Constitution hold their office during good behavior. But, notwithstanding that, the judges of territorial governments, it was held, were always liable to be removed by the President; and a case was brought into the Supreme Court by a judge who had been removed, claiming his salary on the ground that he could not be removed, not because there existed no power to remove in relation to officers generally, but because of the particular character of his office; and the Supreme Court, as well as I recollect—I do not speak with positive certainty on the subject—decided that a judge in a Territory was not to be considered as a judge within the judicial department of the Government, and was therefore just as liable to be removed as any other officer appointed under the Constitution and laws.

Now, I am not sure that I exactly understand the amendment proposed by my friend from Illinois. He does not mean, I suppose, to deny that the President has a right to remove, but he provides that if he does remove, and if the officer whom he appoints to take the place of the officer removed goes into office, he shall receive no compensation until his appointment shall have been confirmed by the Senate. I suppose that the time when the President of the United States is to send in his nominations is a matter for himself to decide, as it is for the Senate to decide at what time they will act upon the nominations when they shall come in. If he has a right to remove and he has a right to appoint, and no officer is to get his pay until the Senate have acted upon the nomination, when it shall act, what is to become of the interests of the country in the interval that may pass between the period of the removal of the original incumbent and the confirmation of the nomination of his successor? Are the wheels of the Government, as far as they depend upon the filling of that office, to be arrested, to be stopped? And if they are not, is it proper to pass such an amendment as this, as the amendment will necessarily lead to that result? It cannot be supposed that a man will go into office and remain there subject to the contingency that he may be rejected by the Senate, that no matter how long he remains during a long session he is to get nothing unless the Senate shall confirm him. I should like to hear from my friend from Illinois upon what grounds he supposes that the power in the first place exists; and secondly, if the power exists, upon what grounds he supposes it to be advisable to exercise the power.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do not think that the question of the power of the President to remove from office an incumbent and appoint another in his place during the recess is necessarily involved in the amendment which I have offered. That is a controverted point and has been from the foundation of the Government. The practice, I am aware, has been for the President to exercise the power to remove from office by making new appointments; and this has generally been acquiesced in.

The laws upon this subject have not, however, been uniform. In 1863 there was created an officer called the Comptroller of the Currency, and in the law establishing the Currency Bureau it was provided that "there shall be appointed a chief officer to be styled the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury." The law further provided that "he shall be appointed by the President, on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years unless sooner removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

That law, passed in 1863, provided that the Comptroller of the Currency should be removed from office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate alone, and according to that statute it is not competent for the President of the United States to remove the Comptroller of the Currency except by the advice and consent of the Senate. The legislative construction which was put upon the President's power in 1863 by this act was that it was competent for Congress to provide that persons could be removed from office only by the advice and consent of the Senate when they were appointed by that advice and consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of that act?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was approved by the President of the United States at that time, Mr. Lincoln, and I believe—I have not looked into the Journals—it was voted for, my impression is it was voted for by the present President of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of its approval?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The approval was on the 15th of February, 1863.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the present President was not a member of the Senate then.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not quite sure whether the present President of the United States was in this body at that time and voted for the law. My recollection, however, is that he was, but I would not affirm that to be a fact without reference to the Journal; but whether that be so or not, that was the legislative construction of Congress on this power of the President, and the law received the approval of President Lincoln.

But, sir, the amendment which I have proposed does not involve that question. According to my understanding, the President has no authority to fill a vacancy which exists in an office, by himself, without the advice and consent of the Senate, unless that vacancy occurs while the Senate is not in session; and one object of this amendment is to prevent appointments of that character. I deny that if a vacancy exists in an office while the Senate is here, the President has any power to fill up that vacancy without the advice and consent of the Senate. It takes the President and the Senate both to make an officer; but he may make a new appointment in case that officer dies during the recess of the Senate, or resigns his office, or in case the term for which he was appointed expires during the recess of the Senate so that a vacancy occurs, though I am not quite sure that he would have authority to appoint in the case of an expiration of the term, because that may not be the happening of a vacancy, inasmuch as the term expires at a fixed period, there is no uncertainty about it, and it is competent for the President to anticipate that period by sending the nomination of an officer to the Senate while it is in session for its confirmation. I am by no means clear that he has authority to appoint in that case, for then it becomes an appointment to an original office when the term has expired. However, it is provided in this amendment that in either of these cases the President may make an appointment or may fill up the vacancy, and the party will receive his salary. He has the constitutional authority to do this.

But, Mr. President, the control of the revenues of the country and of the money of the country is not in the hands of the President without the authority of Congress; he has no control over one dollar; he cannot draw his own salary except by authority of law; and the Senator from Maryland will observe that this provision does not go to the appointing power at all; it is merely a provision in regard to the salaries of officers or the compensation they are to receive. It is entirely competent for Congress to provide just as much compensation as it pleases, or no compensation. It may authorize an appointment of an officer without attaching any salary or any fees to the discharge of the duties of the office. I think there is a bill now pending, reported by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that provides for the appointment of certain commissioners without any salary whatever. It is entirely competent for Congress to make such provision. There is, therefore, no constitutional question involved in this amendment which I have offered.

We propose to provide that no man placed in an office or undertaking to exercise or perform the duties of an office without the consent of the Senate shall receive any compensation whatever, unless his appointment is to fill up a vacancy which happens by death, resignation, or expiration of the term of service. The intention of this amendment is to prevent any person being turned out of office and another put in his place during the recess of the Senate so as to receive his pay. If the President thinks proper to undertake to remove officers, the successor will receive no pay, if this provision becomes a law, until that successor is confirmed by the Senate. That certainly involves no constitutional question, for it is entirely competent for Congress to pay what salaries it pleases to the officers of the Government, or no salaries at all. The chief object, however, of the amendment was to check the practice of filling up offices in the vacation of the Senate when there was an opportunity to have filled them by and with the advice and consent of the Senate when it was in session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am aware that the money of the Government is placed under the control of Congress; and in one sense, therefore, Congress has the right to refuse to pay salaries. They may refuse to pay the President his salary, now fixed by law. They may refuse to appropriate at all for the payment of the compensation which the laws give, or which the laws ought to give, to the officers who may be appointed from time to time by the appointing power. But the honorable member, I am sure, will see that the ground upon which he places the constitutionality of this legislation, as far as that particular ground is concerned, is one which will not bear examination. If the President has the power to appoint, and the appointee has the right to go into office under the Constitution, although Congress may have the power to say that they will not pay, have they the moral right to say that they will not pay? And if there is no moral right to deny payment in such a case, are they not warring against the spirit of the Constitution, though not against its letter, by refusing to pay?

The Senate of the United States, or both branches of Congress, may become so dissatisfied with the President of the United States as to be exceedingly anxious to get rid of him. His remaining in office may interfere with some favorite policy of Congress; Congress may look to political measures upon which, as they suppose, the welfare of the country depends, and find that they cannot accomplish their purpose in having such measures adopted as long as the incumbent of the presidential office is in his seat. There are two ways to get rid of him. One is to impeach him. That requires, to be successful, a vote in the body of two thirds. Another is to starve him out, and that may be accomplished by refusing to pay his salary; and the honorable member's argument would be just as solid in a case of that description in support of legislation such as I have supposed, as it is in relation to the case before the Senate, provided the President has the authority to remove and to appoint.

Mr. President, in all good temper, I caution my friends, or rather the member who offers this amendment, against what may be the consequences of this precedent in the future. It may answer the temporary purpose for which he avows it now to be designed; but it may be relied upon hereafter to answer a temporary purpose which the honorable member from Illinois would be the last man to wish to see accomplished. The precedent may return to plague the inventor. The dominant party now in each House of Congress may, in the course of time, become a minority. They may have elected their President, and he may be an officer who is willing to carry out their particular policy. These seats, however, and the seats in the other House may be filled by a majority of members who think that the policy which the minority and the President for the time being may desire to carry out, is dangerous to the country, and then they may propose just what the honorable member proposes now, not to take away the power of appointment, as he says, but to refuse to appropriate; not to declare that he shall not appoint, but to declare that if he does appoint his appointment will be futile; and they may go further and say following the principle for which this may be cited as a precedent, that the President, for the time being stands in the way of the true interest and honor of the country, or stands in the way of some party aspiration; but as he cannot be gotten rid of by impeachment they strike at his appointing power, and if they cannot get rid of him by taking from him, practically, the benefit of his appointing power, they accomplish the same thing by providing that no money shall go out of the Treasury to compensate his appointees.

I have now the book before me, and if the Senate will indulge me for a few moments I shall be able to find the letter to which I adverted when I first rose, from Mr. Madison, upon this subject, written when his intellect was as bright as it ever was, written at a period when (if there is any war between Congress and the existing President) there was a war even more bitter than may be supposed to be existing now, between the then Congress and the then President of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. Is there a war now?

Mr. JOHNSON. I say supposing there may be. I only put it as a supposition. I am sure there is no war now, because the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Illinois shows that there is entire confidence in the President; no doubt about that. [Laughter.] Of course I have no right, except by way of supposition, to conjecture that there is a war.

Mr. SUMNER. A mere hypothesis.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a mere hypothesis. I am sure there is no member of the Senate less likely to occasion a war with the President than the honorable member from Illinois; but this has a little squinting that way; and, unfortunately, perhaps, he does not see it. [Laughter.] If the Senate will indulge me until I find the letter to which I have adverted, I will read it as bearing more persuasively upon the question which I think is involved than I am sure would be the effect of anything I could say. While my friend behind me, [Mr. HENDERSON,] to whom I have turned over the book, is searching for the letter, let me say a word on the question what will be done by the proposed amendment.

The honorable member from Illinois tells the Senate that it raises no such constitutional question as I have suggested. If it does not, there is certainly no necessity for the amendment. If what it proposes to accomplish is that which the law now accomplishes, there is no occasion for the amendment. If it leaves the appointing power precisely as free as it is now, there is no occasion for the amendment. But as the amendment is offered upon the hypothesis that the law as it now stands will not accomplish what the amendment proposes to accomplish, the question is whether it does not seek to accomplish something which interferes with the appointing power of the President. Now, does it not? Since it was settled in 1789 nobody has ever seriously questioned that the President has the right to remove. Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay during the exciting periods to which I have adverted, while President Jackson was at the head of the Administration, suggested that there was a serious doubt whether the original decision was a correct one; but as well as I remember, both of them, and particularly Mr. Webster, admitted that it was too late to question the constitutionality of that decision.

What Congress did in the act to which my friend from Illinois adverts was done under the clause of the Constitution which gives the authority to provide for the mode in which officers whose appointments are not provided for in the Constitution may be appointed. That is all; but this goes a stone's throw beyond that. I understand the honorable member from Illinois now as avowing that his purpose is to deny to the President the power to appoint during the recess of the Senate, but that he does not mean to deny his power to remove. What is the benefit of the power to remove unless there exists in connection with it the power to appoint? What is the effect of the removal? Is it to get rid of the incumbent? The grant upon which the power was originally claimed, and was established, was important to the interests of the Government that there should be a right to remove. To give the President the power to remove, and to deny him the power to appoint, is to leave the Government unrepresented in its several administrative departments, to leave offices unfilled. Is the Senate prepared to do that? What is the President to do? I have no more knowledge of the purpose of the President than any member of the Senate; it is not my good fortune to see him except very seldom, and that upon mere matters of business; but what is he to do? If he be the man that his friends suppose him to be, and that his whole life proves him to be, he is a man of firmness—moral as well as physical firmness. Suppose he is of opinion that it is the purpose of Congress to war upon him, by taking from him the power to remove, not by taking it from him directly, but by denying to those whom he shall appoint in place of those that he removes, compensation, what will he do? He will remove and not appoint. Then, what are you to do? Impeach him? If you do, what will be his defense? "My power to remove has been settled from the organization of the Government down to the time of your attempted indirect interference with it. You do not deny my power to remove directly; what you propose to do is, to deny payment to any officer whom I may appoint. You claim that right. So far as power is concerned, you have the power, because no money can be drawn from the Treasury without an appropriation, and you have the power to deny the appropriation. What then? I remove notwithstanding; I will not let a dishonest officer be in; I will not let an incompetent officer be in; I will not let a man who reviles me be in;" and no President from the beginning of the Government to this time, ever has. "I remove such a man; I try to fill his office, but I can get nobody to take his place because you say you will not pay whoever may take his place, and what is the result? The wheels of Government are stopped, and I make an issue with Congress before the people. Whose fault is it? Is it mine, or is it the fault of Congress?"

But, independent of all, Mr. President, I submit to my friends who are in favor of this measure, if any are in favor of it, except the mover of the amendment, what possible good is there to be accomplished? I speak it in no party spirit, for if I know myself I am not under the influence of party spirit, and in the present condition of the country I cannot be made to feel under the influence of party spirit. I ask, in the present condition of the country, what good is to be accomplished by carrying on an apparent war with the President, doing what has never been done in relation to any of his predecessors? What is the condition of the country? The war against rebellion over; the Union still practically dissolved; and what are the signs of the times? The Secretary of State has told us that he has instructed our minister at Vienna to ask for his passports if any Austrian troops are sent to the aid of the tottering empire of Maximilian. No doubt they will be sent. Then I suppose the Austrian minister here will ask for his passports. What are we to do?

Mr. CRESWELL, and others. Let him go. Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly we cannot prevent his going; but what may follow from his going. If we attempt to carry out the threat which is involved in the instructions to our minister at Austria to leave that court, war—war with Austria. Where can we strike her? We may strike the few soldiers she sends into Mexico, but that will do her little if any harm; but where can she not strike us? Fill the seas with privateers, and for aught that we know engage Napoleon as an ally.

I mention such contingencies as this not for the purpose of saying that if they occur they are not to be met in a manly and a patriotic spirit, but for the purpose of invoking my friends in this body to avoid, if it is possible to avoid, any dissension among ourselves. I should fear that while as I think no practical good of any appreciable extent, except perhaps in a party sense, will be accomplished by such an amendment as my friend from Illinois proposes, infinite mischief may be the consequence of our holding in the presence of the world divided councils. Eleven States of the Union are now not represented, and as far as Congress and the presidential election are concerned, not to be represented until after the next presidential election if the report made from the committee of fifteen shall be adopted by Congress. Surely, this is not a time to exhibit before the world divided councils.

Our wishes individually are as nothing; our party hopes, whatever they may be, in my estimation, are as nothing; party ascendancy by either of the parties which are supposed now to divide the country is as nothing compared with the restoration of the Union, and standing, not divided, but standing as one and a united people all under the protection of the Constitution that our fathers framed for us and adopted for us, and entitled to all its rights.

I have now the letter to which I alluded some time ago. It is a letter from Mr. Madison to Edward Coles, who had been his former secretary, dated October 15, 1834. It is quite a long letter; but there are only one or two portions of it that bear on the particular question. In a former letter he had told Mr. Coles that in his opinion the Senate of the United States were inculcating what he termed innovating doctrines; and Coles asked him to specify what he considered to be innovating; and in answer to that request Mr. Madison says:

"You are at a loss for the innovating doctrines of the Senate to which I alluded. Permit me to specify the following:

"The claim, on constitutional ground, to a share in the removal as well as appointment of officers is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement. It is clear that the innovation would not only vary, essentially, the existing balance of power, but expose the Executive, occasionally, to a total inaction, and at all times to delays fatal to the due execution of the laws."

"Another innovation brought forward in the Senate claims for the Legislature a discretionary regulation of the tenure of offices. This, also, would vary the relation of the departments to each other, and leave a wide field for legislative abuses. The power of removal, like that of appointment, ought to be fixed by the Constitution, and both, like the right of suffrage and appointment of Representatives, to be not dependent on the legislative will. In republican Governments the organization of the executive department will always be found the most difficult and delicate, particularly in regard to the appointment, and, most of all, to the removal of officers. It may well deserve consideration how far the present modification of these powers can be constitutionally improved."

Another innovation of great practical importance espoused by the Senate relates to the power of the Executive to make diplomatic and consular appointments in the recess of the Senate. Hitherto it has been the practice to make such appointments to places calling for them, whether the places had or had not before received them. Under no Administration was the distinction more disregarded than under that of Mr. Jefferson, particularly in consular appointments, which rest on the same text of the Constitution with that of public ministers. It is now assumed that the appointments can only be made for occurring vacancies, that is, places which had been previously filled. The error lies in confounding foreign missions under the law of nations with municipal officers under the local law. If they were officers in the constitutional sense, a legislative creation of them being expressly required, they could not be created by the President and Senate. If, indeed, it could be admitted that as offices they would ipso facto be created by the appointment from the President and Senate, the office would expire with the appointment, and the next appointment would create a new office, not fill a vacant one. By regarding those missions not as offices, but as stations or agencies, always existing under the law of nations for Governments agreeing, the one to send the other to receive the proper functionaries, the case, though not perhaps altogether free from difficulty, is better provided for than by any other construction. The doctrine of the Senate would be as injurious in practice as it is unfounded in authority."

The first extract which I read is that which bears more immediately; and I will read it again. The italics are in the work, no doubt by Mr. Madison himself.

"The claim, on constitutional ground, to a share in the removal as well as appointment of officers is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement. It is clear that the innovation"—

The innovation being a claim of participation in the power of removal—

"would not only vary essentially the existing balance of the power but expose the Executive, occasionally, to a total inaction, and at all times to delays fatal to the due execution of the laws."

And the more mature reflection of the great and patriotic men who adorned this body at that time led them to abandon the contest. Now we are about to renew it. My friend from Illinois says that that is not the purpose of the amendment, and yet he cannot help saying that his very object is to deprive the President of the power to remove, not directly, but by taking from the appointees whom he may appoint the compensation which the law would otherwise give.

Now, I submit in all frankness, and, to repeat, without the slightest wish to effect any party purpose, without the most remote idea that my judgment upon this question is influenced at all by any party consideration, that it is all-important to the peace, quiet, prosperity, and honor of the country that we should get along with the President, however he may be, without trenching at all upon the powers which from time to time have been held from the beginning of the Government to belong to that department.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I should like to simplify the question before the Senate, which, it seems to me, the learned Senator from Maryland has done more to perplex than to explain. I say that, of course, with great respect to the learned Senator. It is said that the fox, when pursued, cunningly contrives to throw his pursuers off the scent, and it did seem to me as I was listening to the Senator, that he was imitating that sagacious animal. He was trying to throw the Senate off the scent, and now, sir, my simple purpose will be to bring the Senate back upon the scent.

The Senator very ingeniously reminded you of our relations particularly with Austria, and he opened before us prospects which under his powerful description were calculated certainly to awaken the attention and the interest of the Senate. I share, sir, the solicitude of that Senator with reference to the question to which he has referred, but I beg to remind the Senate that it surely can have nothing to do with this question. Whatever may be our relations with Austria, or with any European Power, I know not how those can affect our decision on the simple question now before us.

Then, again, sir, there is another question of great importance, which the Senator has introduced, and which is, to a certain extent, I admit, germane to this question. I mean that question so much discussed in the early history of our country, and which has never been entirely out of mind, to what extent the Senate may share with the President the power of removal. The Senator opens that question on this occasion, as if that was in issue in the amendment proposed. Permit me to remind the Senate that however associated it may be historically, perhaps, with the amendment now before the Senate, in point of fact it has nothing to do with it. You may have one opinion or another opinion on the question which the Senator has raised, and it will not affect your conclusion on the proposition upon which you are to vote. Whether Senators agree with the learned Senator from Maryland, that the Senate cannot share with the President the power of removal, or whether they disagree with him, what has that to do with the question that is now before us?

Therefore, sir, let me say, the Senator did not advance one jot in his argument when he adduced the authority of Mr. Madison, for Madison did not address himself to the question on which you are to vote. He wrote on entirely a different question, the power of removal. When the power of removal is in discussion, I, for one, shall be ready to enter into that debate, and of course I shall give all due weight to the authority of Mr. Madison, and also the other names which are associated with that question. I may remind the learned Senator, though he is not ignorant of it, that when that question was originally decided in this Chamber, it was under the Administration of George Washington, and by the casting vote of the Vice President of that day, John Adams; and there is reason to believe that when the Senate at that time abdicated its power to interfere in removals, it was governed as much by its great deference for George Washington as it was by any constitutional opinion that it had not the power.

However, I merely refer to these matters in order to put them out of the discussion; they have nothing to do with it; and this brings me to the precise proposition before the Senate. In order that I may make no mistake in stating it, I will read its precise language:

That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

The proposition is very simple; it needs no commentary or no explanation. All familiar with public offices know that there are unquestionably abuses that have occurred in the executive department from the habit, after the adjournment of the Senate, of filling vacancies which had existed during the session of the Senate but which the Senate had chosen not to fill. Is Congress wrong if it undertakes to provide by legislation that in such cases the party nominated shall not be entitled to any salary or compensation until he is afterward confirmed by the Senate? It may be, as the Senator from Maryland suggests, that we may not interfere with the power of removal; but there is one power which Congress has—and the Senate is a part of Congress—and that is the power over the purse strings; and all that this proposition undertakes to do is to exercise power over the purse strings in certain cases, so as to impose a check, a constitutional check, which recent events show ought to be imposed upon the Executive. The proposition is so simple that it hardly justifies argument, and I will not take any further time about it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland is mistaken in supposing that this is a measure hostile to the Executive of the United States. It is an amendment intended to carry out what I conceive to be clearly the constitutional authority of Congress and to prevent a practice which has grown up of making appointments to office without consulting the Senate. The Senator from Maryland remarked the other day, very properly, that if the practice were to prevail that the President should fill up vacancies during the recess to continue until the end of the next session of the Senate, and then, without nominating anybody to the Senate during its session who could obtain a confirmation, were again after the adjournment of the Senate to make a new appointment to continue to the end of the then next session, he could in this way continue to exercise the appointing power without consulting the Senate at all. The Senator admitted that this would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

This is no new idea in this body, nor is it aimed at the present Executive of the United States. Congress had occasion more than three years ago to pass an act upon this very subject. At that time persons were being appointed to office in this same way, without consulting the Senate. What did Congress do? It passed an act providing—

"That no money shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States to any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval, as salary in any office which office is not authorized by some previously existing law, unless where such office shall be subsequently sanctioned by law; nor shall any money be paid out of the Treasury as salary to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office which vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and is by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate until such appointee shall have been confirmed by the Senate."

We provided more than three years ago, on the 9th of February, 1863, that in all cases where a vacancy existed which might have been filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate while it was in session, if the President afterward undertook to fill that vacancy, the appointee should receive no salary until he was confirmed by the Senate. That is one case which is covered by the pending amendment. This amendment, however, goes a little further than the law of 1863, but not very much further. What is there in it? A practice has grown up, not under the present Executive more, than under other Executives, of filling offices, as I think, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, he doing it himself without consulting the Senate when it is practicable to consult the Senate. We tried to check this in 1863. Now, the provision that is offered is simply that if a person is placed in office under circumstances where it would have been practicable to have the advice and consent of the Senate without their advice and consent, then that person shall not be paid until the Senate consents to his appointment. When the Senate does consent he receives pay from the beginning. If the Senate of the United States were to adjourn on the 1st day of May, tomorrow, and a person were appointed by the President to an office which is vacant to-day, he could not under this provision receive any salary until the Senate met again next December and confirmed him; and why? Because the President ought, under the Constitution, to have sent us the name of the person to fill that office while we were here and to have had our advice and consent to his appointment. If he will not do that, the appointee must wait until the Senate convenes and gives its sanction to the appointment, and then he will receive his pay. There is no violation of any constitutional provision in doing this. But it is said that an officer may misbehave and the President ought to have authority to remove him. He may in using the public money during the recess of the Senate be guilty of some malfeasance, and he ought to be turned out. This provision does not interfere with that. Let the President suspend him and turn him out; let him also, if you please, designate some other person to fill the office until the Senate meets; and all there is of it is that until that other person is confirmed he will not be paid; but when he is confirmed he will be paid from the beginning. Is there any hardship in it? It has been suggested by some that the amendment might be amended in that respect so as to provide that in case of a removal for cause, to be reported to the Senate when it assembled, the appointee should receive pay from the time of the appointment. There perhaps would be no very good objection to an amendment of that kind, though I do not deem it essential or necessary, for I think there would be no sort of difficulty in finding good men to take any office and run the hazard of their confirmation by the Senate when they were appointed because the incumbent was unfit to hold the office. There would be no hesitation on the part of the Senate in confirming a person appointed under such circumstances and allowing him his pay. He would run no hazard in taking the office; but if without cause, if simply to put into office a partisan for party purposes and to the detriment of the public service, a removal is made, it is very questionable whether the appointee could or should be confirmed or even receive any compensation. Where the removal was for cause there would be no difficulty.

That is all there is of this amendment. It is no new provision, no attack upon the Executive, and I do not think it is likely to occasion war with Austria. [Laughter.] I do not myself think that we should be diverted from proper legislation by getting up any alarm of that kind. The withdrawal of our minister from Vienna or the withdrawal of the Austrian minister from Washington I do not think should prevent proper legislation on a subject of this character, and I really do not know what it has to do with the particular provision before the Senate.

I cannot see, therefore, Mr. President, any objection to the amendment. It seems to me it involves no constitutional principle whatever. All there is of it is that it will have a tendency to correct a practice which has been indulged in without any design, probably, on the part of former Presidents, and which I think ought to be corrected. I think the tendency of the act of 1863 was to correct a practice which was then growing up. It attacked it. This is another provision in the same direction covering what is already covered by the act which I have read and going a very little further, so as to embrace appointments to vacancies which are created during the recess of the Senate. I trust, sir, that the amendment will receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish I could see this matter as clearly, and perceive the path of duty as easily as my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Illinois. I should like very much to promote the manifest object of the amendment, to prevent removals during the recess for political reasons. The Constitution provides for two classes of appointments: one made during the session of the Senate, which are of no validity until they are sent to the Senate and confirmed. They are the classes of appointments referred to by the law of 1863, a law that I remember very well, and which grew out of abuse by the Executive of the constitutional power to appoint to office. Where a vacancy occurs during the session of the Senate, the appointment of the President is of no validity and has no force until it is sent to the Senate and is confirmed. No accounting officer of the Treasury would pay the salary from the time of the appointment until the confirmation, because the appointment only takes effect from the confirmation. The act of 1863 was simply declaratory of the Constitution in that respect. I presume it did not change in the slightest degree either the practice of the accounting officers or the practice of the Government itself.

But this amendment goes beyond that; it in effect declares that the President of the United States shall not remove anybody from office during the vacation, except upon the penalty that the successor shall get no pay unless at the pleasure of the Senate; that the officer who may be appointed by the President in case of a removal during the recess of the Senate, shall perform the duties of his office without pay until the Senate confirms him, and in case the Senate refuses to confirm him that he shall discharge the duties of his office without pay at all. The Constitution provides that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." Now, let me take a case, which I submit to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee: suppose that after the adjournment an officer of the Government should become a defaulter, and should be removed for defalcation, or for crime, and some one else should be appointed in his place. That person thus appointed would be a legal officer of the Government, just as much so as the Senator from Illinois; just as much so as I am, just as much so as any officer of the Government can be. Does he propose to say that this officer shall not receive any pay whatever until the Senate has confirmed the appointment? Suppose the confirmation is refused by the Senate: does the Senator mean to say that officer shall receive no pay, although thus confessedly legally appointed, unless the Senate confirm him? The Constitution declares that this appointment made during the vacation is a legal, valid appointment which shall last until the close of the following session of the Senate. The officer is just as much an officer when he takes the oath of office under that appointment as he would be after the confirmation of the Senate in case he had been appointed during the session of the Senate. Do we say that we will not pay an officer for his services during the time he confessedly holds his office legally. That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. That is excluded, as I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. I ask the Senator from Illinois if that is not the legal effect of the proposition. I should like to have him state whether the effect of the proposition is not as I state. A removal occurs for cause, say for defalcation, during the recess; the vacancy occurs by removal for some good cause, a cause that he concedes to be good.

and a person is appointed to fill that vacancy; the person who holds that office is an officer of the Government, entitled under the law to his salary, just as much an officer of the Government as if he had been confirmed by the Senate in case the vacancy had occurred during the session of the Senate. Suppose that the officer thus legally appointed should die before the Senate could act upon him. In that case he would get no pay at all. Suppose there should be a division in the Senate on the question, and he should not be confirmed by the mere neglect or non-action of the Senate. The officer thus legally appointed would get no pay.

I see difficulties in the way. I should like very much, indeed, if it is within our power—I do not say it is not—to have some law passed which may limit and restrain the power of removal during the vacation of the Senate. Indeed, I do not think the question of the power of Congress to limit and control the authority of the President to remove has ever been settled. In my judgment, Congress may by law limit the power of removal; and why? The power of removal is not conferred upon the President by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution nowhere gives him the power to remove any man from office. It is a mere inferential power, derived from the power of appointment. It was a power denied in the early organization of the Government, and as a Senator has suggested, a resolution affirming it was only carried by the casting vote of John Adams. It was regarded as a question of great doubt. The power of removal is nowhere conferred by the Constitution on the President of the United States in express terms. His power of removal is simply inferential from the power given him by the Constitution to appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, &c. What is there in the Constitution to prevent Congress from regulating and controlling to some extent the power of removal? Nothing whatever. We have done it in repeated cases. This very point was made at the time we passed the first law organizing the national banks. It was then discussed whether or not Congress could limit or restrain the power of the President to remove a man from office. The first law that was passed expressly provided that he should not remove the Comptroller of the Currency except on such and such conditions. Where do we gain that power? From the Constitution, from the inherent right of Congress to pass laws which are binding on the President. I therefore admit that Congress may by law restrain and limit the power of the President to remove.

But in my judgment the particular proposition which denies to an officer legally appointed during the recess his salary except upon a condition that may or may not happen, is at least a very harsh and violent measure, which I would hesitate very much to resort to. There is a remedy for the evil complained of, in my judgment, and it is without a measure of this kind. I dislike very much to see these propositions attached to our appropriation bills. They are in the nature of conditions to what we ought freely to grant, appropriations to meet the expenses of the Government. I do not like to see them put on in that way; but if the Senator from Illinois or the Judiciary Committee will frame a bill which will limit and restrain the power of the President to remove from office, so that when a man is appointed for four years he shall hold that office during that four years, unless he is removed for cause, to be submitted to the Senate, I will vote for such a proposition, and I say there never was a time when this great question could be more fairly met than now. It is admitted on all hands that at least a jealousy exists between the President and Congress; I will not say war, because I do not think there is a war, but there is a jealousy and a watchfulness probably on the part of the President and on the part of Congress. What is to prevent Congress now from passing such a law as I have indicated? The majority here is overwhelming. We have no object to accomplish of a mere partisan purpose. The majority in Congress is perhaps two thirds in a party sense. What is to prevent now the Judiciary Committee from carefully framing a law prescribing the term of office of the various classes of officers of the Government and declaring that the President shall not remove any one of those officers except for such and such causes?

I venture to say, although the opinion of Mr. Madison has been read to the effect that we cannot control the power of removal, that no great statesman has ever declared that where a man is appointed to office for a period of time fixed by law, and the power is not given to the President to remove him from that office, he can be removed without cause. That power is not conferred by the Constitution, and it is only derived inferentially—a power not to be extended. It seems to me that this is the solution of this whole difficulty. I hesitate very much to prescribe these tests in an appropriation bill, and I warn Senators that we yield an advantage, if I may so say, when we attach these propositions to appropriation bills which must pass in the ordinary course of business. Whoever is President, we must have appropriations to carry on the Government. We cannot justify any measure to restrain even a real, much less a fancied danger, by attaching these clogs and qualifications to appropriation bills. Now is the time, while we have ample power, even by a two-thirds vote in both Houses of Congress, to pass a just and wise law on this subject. I do not see any reason why the law should not now be passed. If so, it would properly come from the Judiciary Committee. It could be there properly considered and framed. The question ought not to be passed on in this informal way as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

These are my views, and I am bound to express them. I desire to accomplish to some extent at least the purpose here indicated, and probably I should go as far as the Senator from Illinois desires to go in this amendment; but I do not think it would be wise for us now to pass a proposition which would declare that an officer of the Government legally appointed under existing laws in accordance with the practice of the Government from the foundation to this time, shall receive no pay unless we should hereafter confirm that appointment. It is a stretch of power and of law that I think there is no example of in this Government. The case cited by the honorable Senator from Illinois is no parallel case, because that was a case where the appointment was made in violation of the Constitution, where the vacancy occurred during the session of the Senate, and the President undertook during the recess to fill up that vacancy. There was a case where he undertook to exercise a power and confer an appointment which he could not do except by the confirmation of the Senate, and the law properly declared that no money should be taken out of the Treasury for such a bad and informal appointment. But this amendment goes beyond that, and declares that a man shall not receive pay for an office to which he has been legally appointed.

The Senator from Illinois says it is no great hardship, because if a good man is appointed during the vacation the Senate will confirm him; but I ask the Senator whether a man is compelled to hold office in this country upon those terms and conditions. The framers of the Constitution contemplated a necessity impending upon the President to appoint officers during the recess of the Senate, and they provided for it. They are legal officers just as much so as I am. For us at this stage of the session to declare that those persons thus legally appointed shall not receive their pay until the Senate shall act at some future day, and that in the mean time public officers shall transact their business without pay for months, is rather an extraordinary proceeding. Take the case of a revenue officer collecting large sums of money who has to appoint an army of deputies, and in many cases those officers have to pay their deputies or employes out of their fees or salaries. You require the officer to go on perhaps for nine months to discharge the duties of the office, paying in the mean time all the expenses of the office out of his own pocket, upon the uncertain contingency of a future confirmation by the Senate, and then you provide that in case the Senate does not see proper to confirm the man, he shall not have anything during all this period of time. That is the legal effect of this amendment; and I hesitate, I confess, to embark in that kind of conditions, but I am perfectly willing to support the Senator from Illinois in a proposition to limit by law the power of the President over all the public officers. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri did not go so far. It contained two simple propositions affecting mainly those that were appointed to fill vacancies occurring during the session of the Senate. It met my approval. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri went no further than the law of 1863, but this goes a great way beyond that, and I confess I hesitate in taking the step.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is true that when this bill was up for consideration a few days ago I offered two amendments, not going the length of the proposed amendment now pending, but I am not disposed to think that this amendment cannot constitutionally be adopted. I think it can. I am not like the Senator from Illinois, either, upon the subject of restraining the power of the President to make these appointments. I freely confess that so far as I am concerned that is my desire. When I first offered amendments to this bill, I was governed by what had been the policy of the executive government heretofore, and the claim of power on the part of the Executive to make removals. I was willing to admit the existence of the power, simply because it had been exercised heretofore. Since I offered those amendments I have examined somewhat into this subject, and I can state to the Senator from Illinois that I have partially prepared a bill covering this whole question, and I design going on and completing a bill which will provide, as I think, for almost every conceivable case. I have, since that time, also examined somewhat into the history of this matter, and I have come to the conclusion—and I hope that it is a conclusion arrived at without any bias or prejudice from existing circumstances—that the President has no power constitutionally to remove an officer at all.

I am aware that Mr. Madison expressed his opinions repeatedly on the subject. I will refer the Senator from Maryland, who has given the opinions of Mr. Madison in a letter written in 1834, to his opinions given in the first debate on this subject in 1789. I honestly believe that all the mistake that has originated on this subject comes from the determination of the lower branch, and the Senate also, at a subsequent period in 1789 on this very subject. The Senator, of course, is well aware how the question came to be decided in 1789, and I really think it has been used as a precedent from that day to this without any reason for it. The truth of the matter is that it is not a precedent for such removals as are daily made now by the executive department of the Government. You will remember that immediately after the meeting of Congress a proposition was made to establish the various Executive Departments. Mr. Madison moved to amend it. The motion of Mr. Madison was:

"That it is the opinion of this committee that there shall be established an Executive Department to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer to be called the Secretary to the Department of Foreign Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to be removable by the President."

The debate which has been cited as a precedent upon this subject originated upon that proposition of Mr. Madison. Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the words "who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." The ground of his motion was that the President had the power to make the nomination by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution; that there was no necessity for providing by law that he should nominate; but that when a law created an office under the United States it was the duty of the President to make the nomination, but the Senate must confirm it; that the use of the words was mere surplusage; and the words were stricken out by a large majority. But the important question then arose; the proposition was made by Mr. Bland, of Virginia, to strike out the other words, "to be removable by the President," and then came the question. Mr. Madison upon that point used the following words, and they are much more clear and explicit than the words he used afterward in his letter to Mr. Coles:

"Mr. Madison did not concur with the gentleman in his interpretation of the Constitution. What, said he, would be the consequence of such construction? It would in effect establish every officer of the Government on the firm tenure of good behavior; not the heads of Departments only, but all the inferior officers of those Departments, would hold their offices during good behavior, and that to be judged of by one branch of the Legislature only on the impeachment of the other. If the Constitution means this by its declarations to be the case, we must submit; but I should lament it as a fatal error interwoven in the system, and one that would ultimately prove its destruction. I think the inference would not arise from a fair construction of the words of that instrument."

After a very long discussion, from which I will read only a few extracts from the speech of Mr. Gerry, who was also a member of the Convention, it was decided by a very large majority that the power of removal should be given to the President. I desire to refer to the remarks of Mr. Gerry on that occasion. He said:

"The Constitution provides for the appointment of the public officers in this manner: the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to this opinion of Mr. Gerry, which is of almost as much value as the opinion of Mr. Madison:

"Now, if there be no other clause respecting the appointment, I shall be glad to see how the heads of Departments are to be removed by the President alone. What clause is it that gives this power in express terms? I believe there is none such. If there is a power of removal, besides that by impeachment, it must vest somewhere. It must vest in the President, or in the President and Senate, or in the President, Senate, and House of Representatives. Now, there is no clause which expressly vests it in the President. I believe no gentleman contends it is in this House, because that would be that mingling of the executive and legislative powers that gentlemen deprecate. I presume, then, gentlemen will grant that if there is such a power, it vests with the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are the body that appoints. I think we ought to be cautious how we step in between the President and the Senate, to abridge the power of the one or increase the other. If the power of removal vests where I suppose, we, by this declaration, undertake to transfer it to the President alone."

This proposition afterward went to the Senate, and after a discussion in the Senate upon the points involved in it, it was decided by the casting vote of the President of the Senate that the President of the United States should have the power of removal. What was it that was decided? It was decided the law should be so constructed in creating the Executive Departments, presided over by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Minister of War, that the President should at his pleasure remove them. That was all that was determined.

The question arose again, it will be recollected, in 1814, upon the appointment by Mr. Madison of the commissioners to settle the terms of peace with Great Britain. Mr. Madison, it will be remembered, made an appointment of commissioners to go to Europe on the subject of peace and to meet commissioners to be appointed by Great Britain, without any law or Congress whatever. A proposition was offered in the Senate declaring that Mr. Madison had exceeded his powers on that subject, and the question was discussed as to the power of the President to make such appointments without law. Although there was no positive decision on the point, perhaps the better of the argument was inasmuch as we were in a state of war, even if the President had not the power to appoint those commissioners under the clause which we have been discussing here, namely, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, ministers, consuls, &c., he certainly had the authority under the treaty-making power.

The question came up again in 1827, and I desire to refer to the opinions that were then expressed. In 1827 the Senate appointed a committee to examine into this subject. That committee consisted of Mr. Benton, who was the chairman, Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, Mr. Van Buren, of New York, Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey, who was afterwards Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Mr. White, of Tennessee, Mr. Holmes, of Maine, Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, and Mr. Finlay, of Pennsylvania. They investigated the subject and made a report. The Senator from Maryland has relied upon the opinions of Mr. Madison. I do not desire to read the whole of this report, nor any very considerable portion of it, but I will refer to a passage from it in order to show the reasoning in favor of the proposition that is now made by the Senator from Illinois. They say:

"It is no longer true that the President in dealing out offices will be limited, as supposed in the Federalist, to the inconsiderable number of places which may become vacant by the ordinary casualties of death and resignation. On the contrary, he may now draw for that purpose upon the entire fund of the executive patronage. Construction and legislation have accomplished this change. In the very first year of the Constitution a construction was put upon that instrument which enabled the President to create as many vacancies as he pleased."

Alluding to the construction to which I have referred:

"In the very first year of the Constitution a construction was put upon that instrument which enabled the President to create as many vacancies as he pleased and any moment he thought proper. This was effected by yielding to him the kingly prerogative of dismissing officers without the formality of a trial. The authors of the Federalist had not foreseen this construction. So far from it, they had asserted the contrary; and arguing logically that the dismissing power was pertinent to the appointing power, they had maintained, in No. 77 of that standard work—

That is a number written by Mr. Hamilton, because it is well known that Mr. Madison's opinions were to the contrary. From the very origin of the Government down to the day of his death, he held that the President had the power of removal; but I must say, from an examination of the opinions of the leading men of that day, that Mr. Madison was almost alone.

"They had maintained in No. 77 of that standard work that if the consent of the Senate was necessary to appointment, their consent was necessary to dismissal from office; but this construction was overruled by the first Congress which was formed under the Constitution: the power of dismissal was abandoned to the President alone; and with the acquisition of this prerogative, the power and patronage of the presidential office was increased to an indefinite extent, and the argument of the Federalist against the capacity of the President to corrupt members of Congress founded on the small number of places was totally overthrown. So much for construction. Now for the facts of legislation: without going into an enumeration of the statutes which unnecessarily increase the executive patronage, the four years' appointment law will alone be mentioned; for this single act * * * * "places more offices at the command of the President than were known to the Constitution at the time of its adoption, and is of itself amply sufficient to overthrow the whole argument used in the Federalist."

That was not the only time that this subject was considered in Congress. I find that in 1834 this question came up again. Mr. Clay, on the 7th of March, 1834, introduced into the Senate some resolutions in regard to it. I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to those resolutions, and also to the opinion of Mr. Clay, which I think is dispassionate and correct. The first resolution was in these words:

"1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States does not vest in the President power to remove at his pleasure officers under the Government of the United States whose offices have been established by law.

"2. Resolved, That in all cases of offices created by law, the tenure of holding which is not prescribed by the Constitution, Congress is authorized by the Constitution to prescribe the tenure, terms, and conditions on which they are to be held."

Sustaining fully the view taken by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] The third resolution was in these words:

"3. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that in all instances of appointment to office by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, other than diplomatic appointments—

Of course, leaving the action taken by Mr. Madison, in 1814, to stand as a valid action—"the power of removal shall be exercised only in concurrence with the Senate; and when the Senate is not in session, that the President may suspend any such officer, communicating his reasons for the suspension to the Senate at its first succeeding session; and if the Senate concur with him, the officer shall be removed; but if it do not concur with him, the officer shall be restored to office."

"4. Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of all deputy postmasters whose annual emoluments exceed a prescribed limit."

That was done afterward. I will now read an extract from the remarks of Mr. Clay on the subject. Upon the introduction of his resolutions, Mr. Clay said:

"The three first resolutions assumed that the Constitution gave no power of removal from office by the President of the United States at his pleasure. He was fully aware that this power was conceded to the President by the first Congress which sat under the Constitution."

Alluding, of course, to the proceedings to which I have referred.

"But since that period, except in an incidental discussion here four or five years ago, it has never been discussed in Congress."

Alluding to the discussion upon the report of Mr. Benton in 1827.

"He had carefully looked into the Constitution, as it related to the power of removal in the President, and the result was that the power was not reposed in the President in the instance indicated in the resolutions. He believed the assertion of the power by the first Congress was improvident, and not the least reason for this opinion was the confidence which that Congress reposed in the wisdom, the prudence, and the patriotism of the first President, the Father of his Country."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Clay had no such confidence in General Jackson.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am aware that the Senator will find some excuse for the opinions of Mr. Clay; but Mr. Clay was not alone at that period of time. Mr. Benton, himself, at the time these resolutions were offered, although he claimed to be the champion of the Administration of General Jackson, did not undertake to answer the report which he himself had made in 1827, which I have just read to the Senate. The Senator from Maryland will of course answer me that Mr. Adams was at that time President; but it was not disputed in 1834 that the report made by the leaders of the Democratic party in 1827 was not the true doctrine. I will refer the Senator to the opinions of Mr. Calhoun, in a speech delivered in February, 1835, which he will find in the second volume of Mr. Calhoun's Works. However much he may say that Mr. Calhoun was opposed to the Administration, and that his constitutional argument may have proceeded from a dislike of General Jackson, and whatever may be the Senator's feelings toward Mr. Johnson, the present President, and his desire to sustain him in this matter, yet I apprehend, when I read a short extract from this constitutional view taken by Mr. Calhoun, he will find it much more difficult to answer Mr. Calhoun's arguments than he does to say something in favor of Mr. Johnson. I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to this argument of the Senator from Maryland. It is put much better than I could possibly put it. I will read a short extract from it. It seems to me it is perfectly conclusive:

"If the power to dismiss is possessed by the Executive, he must hold it in one of two modes: either by an express grant of the power in the Constitution, or as a power necessary and proper to execute some power expressly granted by that instrument. All the powers under the Constitution may be classed under one or the other of these heads; there is no intermediate class. The first question then is, has the President the power in question by any express grant in the Constitution? He who affirms he has, is bound to show it. That instrument is in the hands of every member; the portion containing the delegation of power to the President is short. It is comprised in a few sentences. I ask Senators to open the Constitution, to examine it, and to find, if they can, any authority of the President to dismiss any public officer. None such can be found; the Constitution has been carefully examined, and no one pretends to have found such a grant. Well, then, as there is none such, if it exists at all, it must exist as a power necessary and proper to execute some granted power; but if it exists in that character, it belongs to Congress and not to the Executive. I venture not this assertion hastily: I speak on the authority of the Constitution itself—an express and unequivocal authority which cannot be denied nor contradicted. Hear what that sacred instrument says: 'Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers (those granted to Congress itself,) and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.' Mark the fullness of the expression. Congress shall have power to make all laws, not only to carry into effect the powers expressly delegated to itself, but those delegated to the Government, or any Department or officer thereof; comprehending, of course, the power to pass laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers expressly granted to the executive department. It follows that, to whatever express grant of power to the Executive the power of dismissal may be supposed to attach; whether to that of seeing the laws faithfully executed, or to the still more comprehensive grant, as contended for by some, vesting executive powers in the President, the mere fact that it is a power appertaining to another power, and necessary to carry it into effect, transfers it by the provisions of the Constitution cited from the Executive to Congress, and places it under its control, to be regulated in the manner which it may judge best."

Again, Mr. Calhoun in this argument says: "Such are the arguments by which I have been forced to conclude, that the power of dismissing is not lodged in the President, but is subject to be controlled and regulated by Congress. I say forced, because I have been compelled to the conclusion in spite of my previous impressions. Relying upon the early decision of the question, and the long acquiescence in that decision."

Referring to the argument in Congress in 1789—

"I had concluded, without examination, that it had not been disturbed, because it rested upon principles too clear and strong to admit of doubt. I remained passively under this impression, until it became necessary, during the last session, to examine the question, when I took up the discussion on it in 1789, with the expectation of having my previous impression confirmed. The result was different. I was struck, on reading the debate, with the force of the arguments of those who contended that the power was not vested by the Constitution in the Executive. To me they appeared to be far more statesmanlike than the opposite arguments, and to partake much more of the spirit of the Constitution. After reading this debate, I turned to the Constitution, which I read with care in reference to the subject discussed, when, for the first time, I was struck with the full force of the clause which I have quoted, and which, in my opinion, forever settles the controversy."

Mr. President, no man can read the debate of 1789, as I have done within the last two or three days, without coming to the same conclusion. Mr. Madison and those who contended with him, it seems to me, were in favor of leaving this power in the hands of the President by their legislation simply because they had entire confidence in the Father of his Country. I have looked at this question of removal, and I find that during the whole eight years of the administration of General Washington, after this debate in Congress, and after the admission that the power rested in the Executive to make removals without cause, there were but nine removals made. I do not say that they were made without cause, but I mean there were but nine removals made by the Executive. Mr. Adams succeeded General Washington, and there were but ten removals during his term of four years. Jefferson was in the presidency for eight years, and he removed but forty-two men. The whole eight years of the administration of Mr. Madison show but three removals. Mr. Madison claimed the power to exist, I admit, as fully as the Senator from Maryland; but how did Mr. Madison exercise that power when he had the control of it himself? In the whole eight years of his administration he saw fit to make but three removals. Mr. Monroe was in the Presidency for eight years, and he made but nine removals. John Quincy Adams, during his four years of administration, made but two removals. Forty years of the Government show but seventy-five removals, not two a year. But when General Jackson came in, the first year showed some two hundred and thirty, and after that, I believe, some four or five thousand; and from that day to this it has been the continual practice of the Executives to seize upon the offices of this country for the purpose of increasing their power and patronage. When we come to examine the Constitution we clearly come to the conclusion that the President has no power to remove an officer. Why should he have the power? He may nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate may appoint an officer, but where does he get the power, as was very properly said by Mr. Calhoun, to remove an officer after he has once been placed in office.

I know that a great many inconveniences may be conjured up. I know that in a great many cases it would be very inconvenient indeed to deny the existence of the power. The Senator from Ohio may very properly say that if this proposition should be adopted many inconveniences will arise in some districts in regard to the collection of the revenue. But let us look at it in another point of view. Suppose that the President is a corrupt man, what then? I would that I had time to read from the reports made in 1827 and 1835 upon this subject, wherein they expressed so much distrust, wherein they expressed so much apprehension of danger in the future arising from this extraordinary power in the hands of the President. We must recollect that now there is a change in affairs; that where there was one office then, there are ten now. Look at the vast machinery for the collection of the internal revenue of the country. Has the President the power when we adjourn, to lay his hands upon every collector and every assessor in this broad land and turn him out? If so, I apprehend that Congress expressing a difference with the Executive will avail nothing. However this Congress may differ from the President in political desires for the future; whatever may be the conflict between us, that conflict will not last long; it will last but a very short time. Can the President, as soon as this Senate shall adjourn, lay his hands upon every officer in this land, upon the consuls and ministers abroad, and upon the assessors and collectors and all the vast machinery for the collection of the internal revenue? Can he seize upon all the post offices in the land? I do not say that he will do so; but I apprehend that if I were the President of the United States, and differed as materially from Congress as he seems to differ from us, and I believed I possessed this power, I would do so. I do not suppose that the President is a better man than I am; I do not say that he is a worse man than I am; I apprehend that we are all actuated by the same feelings and by the same motives. I do the President the credit to suppose that he acts conscientiously in his political opinions; and if he does, why should he not undertake to carry out what he terms "my policy?" If he lays the heavy hand upon all the public offices in this country, what avails it that the people may speak against him, or Congress may speak against him?

Mr. SHERMAN. He would lose more votes by the exercise of a power of that kind, ten thousand times, than he would gain. I do not believe that the power of appointment would affect political opinion in this country one iota. That is my deliberate opinion as to the power of appointment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The public service might suffer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but it would not affect the mass of the people in the slightest degree.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose it would not alter the opinions of a single individual; I submit to the Senator from Ohio that where men by bending the supple hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning, can get that thrift to follow, would not men of the very worst character be apt to get into office? Then, I say, as was said by the Senator from Illinois, the public service will suffer. I differ with the Senator from Ohio. I say that public patronage, as great as the Executive can have if he can turn out every officer in the land, will tend, and does inevitably tend, to sustain the President in his public policy.

Mr. JOHNSON. It weakens him.

Mr. HENDERSON. If it weakens him, then let the Senate thus strengthen the President. If that be so, I am in favor of strengthening the President. The Senator insists that by leaving this power in the hands of the President we weaken him. Then I will change my course of policy, and I will attempt to strengthen the President. I will at least say that the Senate of the United States ought to have some control over these offices. I have no prejudice against the President of the United States. I differ with him in policy. After an examination of this question, and I think I have come to the conclusion conscientiously, I believe that the Senate has a right to say when a man is to be removed from a public office. I believe that the Senate is a part of the appointing power, and that it is also a part of the removing power. There is no power in the Executive to remove any man when once in office unless he gets the consent of the Senate thereto.

Mr. Webster was supposed to be almost as good a constitutional lawyer as Mr. Madison. Mr. Webster made a speech in this same discussion in 1835, an extract from which I will read, and to which I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland. He asked me to show it to him. I have it in my hand:

"After considering the question again and again within the last six years I am willing to say that, in my deliberate judgment, the original decision was wrong."

That was the decision of 1789, from which I have read:

"I cannot but think that those who denied the power in 1789 had the best of the argument; it appears to me, after thorough and repeated and conscientious examination, that an erroneous interpretation was given to the Constitution, in this respect, by the decision of the First Congress."

It is unnecessary to read from other portions of this speech. It is certainly a very able argument, and one which I think as clearly sustains the position which I assume as the argument of Mr. Calhoun. They were certainly both able, as also the report of Mr. Calhoun made in 1835.

The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is in these words:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing or undertaking to exercise or perform the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

The Senator evidently intends to refuse payment to the successors of those men who shall be removed without cause by the President. That is the meaning of it. It can have no other meaning. Now, as I suggested to the Senator this morning—and in much that the Senator from Ohio said I agree—I think that in arranging a law of this character we ought to cover the whole question, and we ought to provide for a temporary suspension by the President. We ought to provide for the filling up of those offices, notice of vacancies in which will not reach us before the adjournment. Otherwise much inconvenience may arise. A man may die in Oregon, and we may have no notice of the vacancy before our adjournment. The President ought to have the power, in a case of that sort, to fill that vacancy before the next session; and even if we do not agree to give our advice and consent to the nomination, that man having discharged the duties of the office ought to be paid. There are many inconveniences that will arise under this provision. The Senator from Ohio has pointed out some of them. I can conceive of many, but if it is insisted upon, if we must have a vote, I would rather adopt this provision and take those inconveniences than to adopt the inconvenience to arise after our adjournment, of the removal of every man unless he will become a fawner to the Administration, a supple tool of the Administration, and unless he will promise his support to it. I say that is corrupting.

If it is known in this country that no man, when once in office, can be removed except by impeachment in this body, or by a vote of this body, then there will be a sense of independence and security that will enable each and every man in this broad land to feel that he is not dependent on the one-man power. We shall have better officers in consequence of it. We shall have men who feel that they can discharge their duties free and independent of the power of the Executive to remove them without consultation with any other branch of the Government.

Why, Mr. President, this power has become alarming in this country. It is high time that Senators should consider it. I do not allude to it simply because I differ with the President now, for that difference has not carried me, I think, beyond prudence or discretion. I do differ with the President. I would that that difference did not exist. I have not carried that difference beyond this Senate Chamber. I have said nothing against his course of conduct, though I think much may be said against it. If this power is to be left in the hands, not only of the present Executive, but for all time to come, in the hands of other Executives, when there are such a large number of offices to be filled, and such a large number of officers now holding positions under the Government, and it is known that the Executive can control them free of any let or hindrance on the part of any other department of the Government, I say it confers upon him a power that is dangerous to the liberties of this country.

I do not apprehend that anything of the sort would be undertaken, but I see that the newspapers throughout this country now are advising the President of the United States to expel this body from their places, to act the Cromwell and drive us out.

Mr. HOWARD. You mean the rebel newspapers.

Mr. HENDERSON. I took up a western paper the other day—I will not name the paper—in which the advice was given boldly and freely to the President, and the people were called upon to sustain the President, to march into this body and drive us out. It has been suggested in various other quarters. I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] suggested, even upon the floor of this body, that the President might control this Congress if he chose so to do; that he could recognize the southern Senators who are waiting for admission, and call upon the minority of this body to join with them, and then send his communications to the new Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me I will state what I did say, and what I now believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. It is made the duty of the President by the Constitution to communicate to Congress and from time to time recommend for its consideration such measures as he shall deem proper. The position I assumed was, that before the President could exercise that office he would have to ascertain what bodies of men constituted the Congress; that if there were four bodies of men—that was the case which I put—two of them contending they were the Senate and the other two bodies contending they were the House of Representatives, the President must necessarily decide which body constituted the House and which body constituted the Senate; that it was a necessity, and that it was his plain, constitutional prerogative and right to determine, under such a state of things as that, which was the true Senate and which was the true House. I furthermore stated that if the southern members were to get together with a number of the other members of the two Houses, and they in the aggregate constituted a majority of the two Houses, the President had the constitutional function and right to decide whether they did or not, and if he chose to recognize them as the two Houses of Congress that constituted a regular, legal, and constitutional Congress. That is still my opinion.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the Congress depends on the will of the President.

Mr. DAVIS. I furthermore stated that it was the province of the two Houses of Congress to judge exclusively each for itself as to the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members; that over those questions the President had no jurisdiction or control; but at the same time, if members contending for seats were to get together in such numbers as to constitute a majority of the two Houses, the President had the right to recognize them as the Congress. I say so still. That is my opinion, my belief.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. In what part of the Constitution does he derive this power which he claims for the President of deciding which is the true Congress and which the contrary?

Mr. DAVIS. I have just stated from whence I derive the power. I will read it. Here is the section:

"He shall from time to time give to Congress"—

Mr. HENDERSON. I was waiting on the Senator from Kentucky to state his views in regard to this double Congress, and if he is through with that I propose going on.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me one moment, it is owing, perhaps, to my fault that the Senator from Kentucky is occupying his time at this moment. I asked him for the warrant which he finds in the Constitution for the President of the United States to recognize the right Congress and reject the wrong Congress. I was very anxious to see the grant of power to the President of the United States to draw such a distinction.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; I ask pardon for interfering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I had lost sight of the Senator from Missouri in replying to the interrogatory of the Senator from Michigan. This was the authority upon which I relied as to the duties of the President:

"He shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

Now, before the President can recommend to Congress such measures as he may judge necessary and expedient, it results as a matter of necessity that he must ascertain what body of men constitute the Congress. The case I put was this: suppose a portion of the present Senate were to get together, and they were to receive the Senators claiming to be elected from the southern States, and they should organize as a Senate, and the Republican members of the Senate should make a separate organization, there would then be two organized bodies of men, each claiming to be the Senate of the United States. I said the President would have the constitutional power to say which he would recognize as the Senate; and that was the whole of my proposition. I admitted, however, at the same time, that the President would have no power whatever in deciding the question as to the elections, returns, or qualifications of any member of either body; that those questions would have to be decided by each branch of Congress for itself and not by a committee of fifteen.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to ask my friend from Kentucky a question, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I listened, as we all did, with a good deal of attention and surprise to the speech which he is now explaining, and

I looked for it in the Congressional Globe, but have never seen it, and I wish to know if it is the fault of the reporters of the Globe that it has not been printed, and if not, whose fault it is.

Mr. DAVIS. It is my fault, but it will be printed in due time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the practice of making speeches and then suppressing them in the Globe, thereby making those who reply to them appear very ridiculous, and their remarks very inconsequential, ought to be stopped in some way or other. I do not understand what right the proprietors of the Congressional Globe, or the reporters of the Congressional Globe, have to omit any speech that has been made. I am told—perhaps I am mistaken—that speeches have been made here in previous sessions which have never been printed and never gone into the Globe at all. I do not know that there is any law or any rule against the practice, but I think there ought to be one. I think the reporters of the Congressional Globe are bound to print what is said here, and to print it within a reasonable time; and I give notice that unless that is done, I shall feel justified in opposing the appropriation for the payment of the Congressional Globe. They agree to publish those speeches; they do not do it; and if it is their fault, then I think they ought not to be paid. If it is not their fault, then I think the reporters ought to be protected in such a way as that they shall have no discretion in the matter. Of course, if a Senator comes and desires to have his remarks suppressed, it is hardly possible for the reporters to refuse, but I think they should be protected from the exercise of any discretion in the matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire, as we have got entirely from the question at issue, to move an adjournment; and I make that motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to say a word of explanation upon the suggestions of the Senator from Rhode Island?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn; and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for a division.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to say a single word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is dividing.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very unfair to adjourn when a Senator desires to make a personal explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is your opinion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; that is my opinion.

The Senate refused to adjourn, there being, on a division—yeas six, noes not counted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I did not desire to show any discourtesy to him in making the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I am fully aware of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But we are entirely away from the question, and it is now almost five o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—
Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky will yield to me for half a minute.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to make my personal explanation in reply to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HOWARD. What I wanted to do, if the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, is to send to the Chair—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I only wish to send to the Chair a portion of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky as reported by the official reporter in order that the Senator may know exactly what he did say on that occasion.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will be read.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about to say a word in relation to the practice of publishing speeches some time after they are delivered. I understand that the whole Appendix of the Globe is made up of speeches that are published some considerable time, more or less, after the time of their delivery. I have met with speeches that were published weeks and months after the day of their delivery, in the Appendix to the Globe. It was only in conformity to that practice that I was acting. The report of my speech was sent to me and I answered in reply that at my leisure I would revise it and would have it published in the Appendix to the Globe. That is all I have to say in relation to the practice of other members of the Senate and in relation to what I did as to that particular speech.

Mr. ANTHONY. There have been some speeches—I do not mean to say speeches of the Senator from Kentucky—but there have been speeches delivered here that have never been printed in the Globe at all; that have been suppressed entirely. That is a practice to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I now send to the Clerk to be read a portion of the speech made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky on the occasion to which he has referred. I wish that it may go into the report of our proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now that we have got through with the personal explanation, I renew the motion to adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us have that read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; but I give notice that I shall renew the motion after the paper has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Here, sir, is a provision in the Constitution which requires the President to communicate to the two Houses of Congress information as to the state of the Union, and to recommend to them such measures as he shall deem proper and expedient. What does this require him to do? He has to ascertain who compose the two Houses of Congress. It is his right, it is his constitutional function to ascertain who constitute the two Houses of Congress. The members of the Senate who are in favor of the admission of the southern Senators could get into a conclave with those southern Senators any day, and they would constitute a majority of the Senate. The President of the United States has the constitutional option, it is his function, it is his power, it is his right, and I would advise him to exercise it at any day, to ascertain, where there are different bodies, members of the Senate contending, which is the true Senate. If the southern members and those who are for admitting them to their seats, constitute a majority of the whole Senate, the President has a right—and by the Eternal he ought to exercise that right—forthwith, to-morrow, or any day, to recognize the Opposition here and the southern members of the Senate as a majority of the whole body."

Mr. DAVIS. That is my principle still. I maintain that that is the true principle of the Constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Kentucky says that that is his principle still. I confess I regret very much to hear him make such an announcement. I pronounce that principle to be revolutionary, unconstitutional, and treasonable. I now move that we adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I wholly dissent from the position of the honorable Senator. It is neither revolutionary, nor unconstitutional, nor treasonable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 30, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated as the first business in order the calling of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions on leave, to be referred to the appropriate committees and not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, commencing with the State of Maine.

STATE AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a bill granting further time and facilities for the conversion of State banks into national banks; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SKAMANIA COUNTY, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, also introduced a bill to disapprove of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, entitled "An act in relation to Skamania county," approved January 14, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

HORACE I. HODGES.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Horace I. Hodges; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WILLIAM JONES.

Mr. COFFROTH introduced a bill granting a pension to William Jones; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RAILROAD CONNECTIONS WITH WASHINGTON.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a bill to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest for national purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on a military and postal railroad from Washington to New York, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CUYAHOGA.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a joint resolution for the construction of a railroad bridge across the Cuyahoga river over and upon the Government piers at Cleveland, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM WATKINS.

Mr. GRIDER introduced a bill for the benefit of William Watkins; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

JOHN MUNN.

Mr. NEWELL introduced a bill for the relief of John Munn; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WAGON ROAD IN MONTANA.

Mr. SMITH introduced a bill to aid in the construction of a wagon road in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

TENNESSEE.

Mr. KUYKENDALL introduced a joint resolution declaring the constitutional relations of the State of Tennessee restored to practical relations with the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOHN A. WHITALL.

Mr. BEAMAN introduced a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Major John A. Whittall, late paymaster in the United States Army, on account of loss of stolen vouchers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RAILROAD IN IOWA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REV. F. A. CONWELL.

Mr. WINDOM introduced a bill for the relief of Rev. F. A. Conwell, of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SIOUX RESERVATION, MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM also introduced a joint resolution for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SAMUEL DONNICA.

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill for the relief of Samuel Donnica; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

KANSAS AND NEOSHO VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, introduced a bill granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad and its extension to the Red river; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. ANCONA introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 3, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RAILROAD FROM PITTSBURG TO CLEVELAND.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a bill to promote the construction of a line of railroad from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on a military and postal railroad, and ordered to be printed.

TRIAL OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of States and Territories for resolutions, and under this call the first question is upon a resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.] On last Monday morning the House refused to second the demand for the previous question, and debate arising, the resolution went over until to-day. The resolution is now debatable under the rules.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, As the deliberate judgment of this House, that the speedy trial of Jefferson Davis, either by a civil or military tribunal, for the crime of treason or the other crimes of which he stands charged, and his prompt execution, if found guilty, are imperatively demanded by the people of the United States in order that treason may be adequately branded by the nation, traitors made infamous, and the repetition of their crimes, as far as possible, be prevented.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will consent to have this resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as the committee now have this subject under consideration.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire an opportunity to discuss briefly the question presented by the resolution. I will agree to make the motion for reference at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well; I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, in demanding the punishment of the chief rebel conspirators, I beg not to be misunderstood. I do not ask for vengeance. I feel sure there is no man in the country, however intense his loyalty, who would inflict the slightest unnecessary suffering, or any form of cruelty, upon even the most flagitious of the confederate leaders. What the nation desires, and all it asks, is the ordinary administration of justice against the most extraordinary national criminals. The treason spun from their brains, and deliberately fashioned into the bloody warp and woof of a four years' war, involving the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives, and thousands of millions of treasure, ought to be branded by the nation as a crime. It ought to be made "odious" and "infamous." The punishment of that crime, prescribed by the Constitution, is death; and I am just as unwilling to see the Constitution set aside and made void in this respect, in the interest of vanquished rebel leaders, as I was to see it trampled under foot by their armed legions while the war continued. Indeed, the punishment of these leaders is a necessary part of the logic of their infernal enterprise, and without it the rebellion itself, instead of being effectually crushed, must find a fresh incentive to renew its life in its impunity from the just consequences of its guilt. It will not do to say these leaders have been sufficiently punished already, by the failure of their treason, the loss of their coveted power, and their humiliation, poverty, and disgrace. Kindred arguments would empty our jails and penitentiaries, and make the administration of criminal justice everywhere a farce. The way of all transgressors is hard; but this hardship cannot justify society in failing to protect itself by fitly chastising its enemies. Justice to the nation whose life has been attempted, and to the assassins who made the attempt, is the great demand of the hour.

And here, again, Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall be understood. In pleading for justice I mean of course public justice, which seeks the prevention of crime by making an example of the criminal. Human laws do not pretend to fathom the real moral guilt of offenders. They have no power to do this. Their sole aim is the prevention of crime. They have nothing to do with that retributive justice which graduates the punishment of each transgressor by the exact measure of his guilt. To the great Searcher of all hearts belongs this prerogative, while society, acting through government as its agent, and having an eye single to its own protection, must deal with its criminals. This, sir, is my reply to the plea often urged that we should not hang the rebel leaders, because we cannot also hang the leading sympathizers of the northern States who are perhaps more guilty. The Government has nothing to do with the question of degrees of moral guilt or blame-worthiness, either in the North or the South. Its concern is with the nation's enemies, whose overt acts of treason have made them amenable to the laws, and whose punishment should be made a terror to evil doers hereafter. The fact that our power of punishment cannot reach all who are guilty, including many men in the loyal States who richly deserve the halter, is no reason whatever for allowing those to go unwhipped who are properly within the reach of public justice.

And the same reasoning applies to the argument sometimes urged against all punishment founded on the numbers who would fairly be liable to suffer. The question is frequently asked, would you build a gallows in every village and neighborhood of the South? Would you shock the Christian world by the spectacle of ten thousand gibbets, and the hanging of all who have been guilty of treason, or even a respectable fraction of their number? I answer, I would do no such thing. Public justice and the highest good of the State do not require it. I would simply apply the ordinary rules of criminal jurisprudence to the question, and as in other conspiracies, so in this grand one, I would mete out the severest punishment to the ringleaders. Most undoubtedly I would give them a constitutional entertainment on the gallows; or should the number of ringleaders be too great, or the guilt of some of them be less flagrant than others, perpetual exile might be substituted. The rebel masses, both on the score of their numbers and their qualified guilt, should have a general amnesty; but by no possible means would I spare the unmatched villains who conceived the bloody project of national dismemberment, and by their devilish arts lured into their horrid service the ignorant and misguided people of their section. Whoever may escape justice, either North or South, or whatever embarrassments may be long to the problem of punishment at the end of this stupendous conflict, nothing remains so perfectly clear and unquestionable as the duty of the nation to execute the great malefactors who fashioned to their uses all the genius and resources of the South, and throughout the entire struggle invoked all the powers of hell in their work of national destruction.

Mr. Speaker, the adequate punishment of the rebel leaders involves the whole question of the rebellion itself. It is not a matter which the Government may dispose of indifferently, but is vital to the nation's peace, if not to its very existence. To trifle with it is to trifle with public justice and the holy cause for which the country has been made to bleed and suffer. It is to mock our dead heroes, and confess our own pusillanimity or guilt. It is to make treason respectable, and put loyalty under the ban. It is to call evil good and good evil; and since God is not to be mocked, it must in some form bring down upon our own heads the retribution which we may only escape by enforcing the penal laws of the nation against the magnificent felons who have sought its life.

Sir, I shall take it for granted that treason is a crime, and not a mere accident or mistake. In this most frightful and desolating struggle there is transcendent and unutterable guilt; and I take it for granted that that guilt is on the side of those who wantonly and causelessly took up arms against the nation, and not on the side of those who fought to save it from destruction. Treason is a crime, and therefore not a mere difference of opinion; a crime, and therefore not an honest mistake of judgment about the right of a State to secede; a crime, and therefore not a mere struggle of the South for independence while the North contended for empire; a crime, and therefore not a mere "misapprehension of misguided men," as some of our copperhead journals affirm; a crime, and the highest of all crimes, including all lesser villainies, and eclipsing them all, in its heaven-daring leap at the nation's throat; and therefore those who withstood it by arms were patriots and heroes, fighting for nationality and freedom, against rebels whose sure and swift punishment should be made a warning against the repetition of their deeds.

Mr. Speaker, if a man were to come into our midst and persuade us that treason and loyalty are about the same thing; that right and wrong, good and evil, virtue and vice, are convertible terms; that God and Satan are in fact the same personage, under different names, and that it matters little under whose banner we fight; and if he could thus enlist us in the work of uprooting the foundations of Government, of morals, of society, of everything held sacred among men, would he not be the most execrable creature in the universe? If he could indoctrinate mankind with his theory of "reconstruction," would not this beautiful earth of ours be converted into a first-class hell, with the devil as its king? Sir, you dare not trifle with this question of the punishment of traitors. Theory goes before practice. Right believing, on moral or political issues, precedes right acting; and you touch the very marrow of the rebellion when you approach the question of the punishment of the rebels. Sir, there is not a State in this Union, nor a civilized country on earth, which in the treatment of its criminals sanctions the sickly magnanimity and misapplied humanity of this nation in dealing with its leading traitors. No civilized Government, in my judgment, could possibly be maintained on any such loose and confounded principles. Crime would have unchecked license, and public justice would not even be a decent sham. No man will dispute this, or fail to be amazed that, in dealing with our red-handed traitors, whose crimes are certainly unsurpassed in history, and have filled the land with sorrow and blood, we utterly decline to execute against them the very Constitution which they sought to overturn by years of wholesale rapine and murder.

Sir, this fact is at once monstrous and startling. We seize the murderer who only takes the life of one man, indict him, convict him, and then hang him. Undoubtedly some murderers escape punishment through pardons and otherwise, but certainly the penalty of death is inflicted in most countries. The pirate, who boards a vessel on the sea, and murders a few sailors, is "chased by the civilized world to the gallows." The plea in his behalf of magnanimity to a vanquished criminal would not save him, and his friends would scarcely urge it. Public justice demands the sacrifice of his life, and no one expects him to be spared if fairly convicted. But Jefferson Davis is no ordinary assassin or pirate. He did not murder a single citizen, but hundreds of thousands of men. He did not board a ship on the sea and murder a few sailors, but he boarded the great ship of state, and tried, by all the power of his evil genius, to sink her, cargo and crew, with the hopes of the world forever, into the abyss of eternal night. And is not his guilt as much greater than that of an ordinary assassin or pirate as the life of a great republic is greater than the life of one man? Was not each one of these leaders a national assassin, aiming his bloody dagger at the country's vitals, and is not his guilt multiplied by the millions whose interests were imperiled? And shall justice only be defied by the world's grandest villains and outlaws, and mercy defile herself by taking them into her embrace?

Mr. Speaker, Jefferson Davis was a favored child of the Republic. He had been educated at the nation's expense, and upon him had been lavished the honors and emoluments of office. He owed his country nothing but gratitude and fidelity, and no man understood these obligations better than himself. Again and again he had asked his Maker to witness that he would be faithful to the Constitution, which at the time he was plotting to destroy. Long years before the rebellion he had been inoculating the public opinion of the South with the poison of his heresies, and secretly hatching his treason in the foul atmosphere which he helped to create. His perfidy was most cold-blooded, deliberate, and premeditated. In order to blast the Government of his fathers, and establish upon its ruins a confederacy with slavery as its corner-stone, he has ruthlessly wrapped his country in fire and blood. He has wantonly destroyed the lives of more than two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, who gloriously perished in resisting his treason in arms. He has maimed and crippled for life more than two hundred and fifty thousand more. He has duplicated these atrocities in his own section of the Union. He has organized grand conspiracies in the North and Northwest to lay in rapine and blood the towns and cities and plantations of the whole loyal portion of the land. He has put to death, by the slow torture of starvation in rebel prisons, sixty thousand brave men who went forth to peril their lives in saving the country from his devilish crusade against it. He has deliberately sought to introduce into the United States and to nationalize among us pestilence, in the form of yellow fever; an enterprise which, had it succeeded, would have startled the very heavens above us with the agony and sorrow it would have lavished upon the land. He stands charged by the Government with the murder of the President of the United States, and that charge, as I am well assured, is amply verified by proofs which will very soon be given to the public, and awaken a stronger and sterner demand for his punishment. He has instigated the burning of our hotels. He has planted infernal machines in the tracks of his armies. He has poisoned our wells. He has murdered our wounded soldiers. He has made drinking cups of their skulls and jewelry of their bones. He has spawned upon the world atrocities so monstrous as to defy all definition, and which nothing but the hot incubation of the slave power, as the ripe fruit of its two hundred years of diabolism, could have warmed into life. Sir, he has done everything, by the help of his confederates, that an incarnate demon could do to let loose "the whole contagion of hell," and convert his native land into one grand refuge of devils.

Mr. Speaker, the pardon of a criminal so transcendently guilty would be an act in itself strongly partaking of treason against the nation. It would be at once a monstrous denial and a frightful mockery of justice. Do you plead for mercy to the great confederate assassin? I refer that plea to the Father of Mercies, who, I believe, only pardons on condition of repentance; and as yet I have heard of no rebel leader who even professes penitence for his crimes. Sir, I repudiate, as counterfeit, the mercy which can only be exercised by trampling justice under our feet, while it forgets both justice and mercy to the millions who have been made to mourn through stricken lives by the human monsters who plunged our peaceful country into war. The loyal people of the nation demand that they be dealt with as criminals. For myself, I would not have a civil trial for the leader of a belligerent power, which has maintained a public war against us for years. The nation cannot afford to submit the question of the right of a State to secede to a jury of twelve men in one of the rebel States, and a majority of them traitors, under an implied alternative that if they fail to convict, the Government itself would stand convicted of half a million murders. After the nation has established its right to exist by a four years' war, it cannot put that right on trial by a jury of its conquered enemies, or any earthly tribunal. Sir, let Jefferson Davis be tried by a military court, as he should have been, promptly, at the time other and smaller offenders were dealt with a year ago. Let him have the compliment of a formal inquiry to determine what the whole world already knows, that he is immeasurably guilty. And when that guilt is pronounced let the Government erect a gallows, and hang him in the name of the Most High. I put aside mercy on the one hand, and vengeance on the other, and the simple claim I assert, in the nation's behalf, is justice. In the name of half a million soldiers who have gone before their Maker as witnesses against "the deep damnation of their taking off;" in the name of our living soldiers, who have waded through seas of fire in deadly conflict with rebels in arms; in the name of the Republic, whose life has only been saved by the precious offering of multitudes of her most idolized children; in the name of the great future, with its procession of countless generations of men, whose fate to-day swings in the balance, awaiting the example you are to make of treason, I demand the execution of Jefferson Davis. The gallows is the symbol of infamy throughout the civilized world, and no criminal ever earned a clearer right to be crowned with its honors.

Sir, I ask why the Constitution should be mocked when it demands his life? What right have the authorities of the Government to cheat the halter out of his neck? Not for all the honors and offices of this nation, not for all the gold and glory of the world, would I spare him if in my power; for I would expect the ghosts of three hundred thousand murdered soldiers to haunt my poor, cowardly life to the grave. As I have said already, the punishment of the rebel conspirators is a necessary part of the work of suppressing the rebellion. Their treason was deliberately aimed at the cause of free government on earth, and they are justly to be classed among the guiltiest wretches whose crimes ever drenched the earth in blood. Every one of them should have a felon's death. The grave of every one of them should be made a grave of infamy, and the cause they served should be pilloried by all the ages to come. Sir, if you discharge the confederate chiefs because of the very magnitude of their work of carnage, you offer a public license to treason hereafter. You say to turbulent and seditious spirits everywhere that they have full liberty, when it may suit their convenience, to levy war against the nation, and that while it may lead their deluded followers to wholesale slaughter, they shall be allowed to escape. You say that although the nation participated in the hanging of John Brown as a traitor, for the crime of loving liberty "not wisely, but too well," that same nation, which has copied John Brown's example in emancipating slaves by military power, shall turn loose upon society the hideous monster who waged war to establish and eternize a mighty slave empire on the ruins of our free institutions. And you speak it in the ear of the nations as your deliberate estimate of the value of free government, whose very life is the breath of the people, that the bloody conspirator who seeks to destroy it by the hand of war is undeserving of punishment, and consequently innocent of crime.

Mr. Speaker, can we, dare we, hope for the favor of God in thus confounding the distinction between right and wrong, between treason and loyalty, and forgetting that government is a divine ordinance, whose authority can only be maintained by enforcing obedience to its mandates? I speak earnestly, because I feel deeply, on this question of the punishment of leading traitors. The grand peril of the hour comes from the mistake of the Government on this point. During the war our deserters and bounty jumpers were executed. Our brave boys, overcome by weariness, who fell asleep at their posts as sentinels, were shot. A year ago the miserable tools of Davis and Lee, selected for their infernal deeds because of their known fitness to perform them, were summarily tried and hung. But in no solitary instance has treason yet been dealt with as a crime. Pardon, pardon, pardon, has been the order of the day, as if the Government desired to make haste to apologize for its mistake in fighting traitors, and wished to reinstate itself in their good opinion. Beccaria, in his celebrated Essay on Crimes and Punishments, says that "clemency is a virtue which belongs to the legislator, and not to the executor of the laws; a virtue which ought to shine in the code, and not in private judgment. To show mankind that crimes are sometimes pardoned, and that punishment is not the necessary consequence, is to nourish the flattering hope of impunity, and is the cause of their considering every punishment inflicted as an act of injustice and oppression. The prince, in pardoning, gives up the public security in favor of an individual, and by ill-judged benevolence proclaims a public act of impunity."

Dr. Lieber says that "every pardon granted upon insufficient grounds becomes a serious offense against society, and he that grants it is, in justice, answerable for the offenses which the offender may commit, and the general injury done to political morality by undue interference with the law." With these wise and just sentiments the President of the United States, on accepting his high office, perfectly agreed. He declared that mercy to the individual is often cruelty to the State. He said that "robbery is a crime, murder is a crime, treason is a crime, and crime must be punished." He said that "treason must be made odious, and traitors impoverished," and he reiterated and multiplied these declarations on very many occasions which were offered him for weeks and months following his inauguration. He repeatedly referred, approvingly, to his past record, covering declarations in favor of hanging the leading traitors, in favor of dividing up their great plantations into small farms for honest and industrious men, without regard to color, and in favor of breaking up the great aristocracy of the South, and compelling the rebels to "take the back seats in the work of reconstruction." For a season the whole loyal country was electrified by the clear ring of his words, while rebels were as completely palsied and dumb. They understood the new President quite as little as his loyal friends. They expected no quarter, and studiously sought their pleasure in the will of the Executive. They would have assented gladly to any terms or conditions of reconstruction dictated by him, including even negro suffrage. Having staked all on the issues of war and lost, they felt that they were entitled only to such rights as the conqueror might see fit to impose.

Sir, this golden season was sinning away by the President, and that systematic recreancy to his pledges and record which has marked his subsequent career, has brought the country into the most fearful peril. The responsibility is upon him, and it must be measured by the magnificent opportunity which the situation afforded him for an easy solution of our national difficulties, and at the same time a solid and permanent reconstruction of the South. "No important political movement," says a famous English writer, "was ever obtained in a period of tranquillity. If the effervescence of the public mind is suffered to pass away without effect, it would be absurd to expect from languor what enthusiasm has not obtained. If radical reform is not, at such a moment, procured, all partial changes are evaded and defeated in the tranquillity which succeeds." These are suggestive and solemn words, and the reflection is a very sad one that the nation to-day would have been saved and blest, if the President had heeded them. He disobeyed the divine command to "execute justice in the morning," and did not even remember the heathen maxim, that "the gods themselves cannot save those who neglect opportunities."

Sir, while I dislike the occupation of an alarmist, I must say that I have seen few darker seasons than the present since the first battle of Bull Run. The President has not kept the faith. He has not favored the hanging of a single rebel leader. He has not made treason infamous, nor impoverished traitors. He has not favored the confiscation of rebel estates, and their distribution among the poor. He has not required traitors to take the back seats in the work of reconstruction. He has not cooperated with Congress in placing the governing power of the South and of the nation in the hands of loyal men. He has not shown himself the "Moses" of our loyal colored millions in leading them out of their grievous bondage. He has done the opposite of all these. The Richmond Times, the leading organ of treason in Virginia, says that "in his course toward the mass of those who supported the southern confederacy the President has been singularly magnanimous and wisely lenient. Nine tenths of those who for four years, with unparalleled gallantry upheld the confederacy, have long since been unconditionally pardoned. The cabinet officers who counseled the president of the confederacy, the congressmen who enacted those stringent conscript and imprisonment laws which kept up our armies, and many distinguished generals of the confederate armies, have either been formally pardoned, or been released upon parole, and no one dreams that they will ever be molested in person or estate. The military bastiles of the country, with one exception, have long since been thrown open, and the distinguished confederate officers who were confined in them have been restored to their friends and families." And these Virginia traitors who thus damn our President by their encomiums openly demand the unconditional release of Jefferson Davis from prison. Judging the President by the logic of his policy thus far, the demand will be complied with. When he decided, nearly a year ago, against the trial of Davis by a military court, he virtually decided that his treason should go unpunished; for no jury of southern rebels would ever find a verdict of guilty, and the trial itself would only be an insult to the nation. Jefferson Davis, I doubt not, is to be restored to his family and friends, and the argument of consistency demands it at the hands of the President.

Robert E. Lee, whose spared life has outraged the honest claims of the gallows ever since his surrender, is running at large, perfectly unmolested and safe from all harm. Black with treason, perjury, and murder, guiltier by far than the Christless wretch who obeyed his orders in starving our soldiers at Andersonville, he goes his way in peace, while the Government, in this monstrous and appalling fact, confesses to the world that treason is unworthy of its notice. • He is president of a Virginia college, and teacher of her youth. He visits Washington, and tenders his advice to our public men about the work of restoring the Union. He goes before the reconstruction committee and gives his testimony, as if an oath could take any possible hold upon his seared conscience; and all that can be said is, that his unpunished crimes are doing precisely as much to make the Government infamous, as the Government itself has done to make those crimes respectable. The Legislature of Virginia indorses him as a fit man for Governor, and the champions of this proposition visit our Republican President, laud his principles and policy, and take the front seats in the house of his friends.

The vice president of the southern confederacy is likewise at large, and has been elected a Senator in Congress from his State. He also visits Washington, and gives his testimony before the joint committee of fifteen. Like the other leading traitors, he very naturally "accepts the situation," because he could not do otherwise, but he shows not the smallest token of penitence, says the rebels were in the right, and seems wholly unconscious of his real character as simply an unhung traitor, whose advice and opinions we shall only accept at their value. Leading traitors are not only pardoned by wholesale, but they hold nearly all the places of power and profit in the South. They are made Governors, judges, postmasters, revenue officers, and are likewise frequently chosen to represent their cause in Congress; and the President, our distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, and the Postmaster General, have all openly trampled under their feet the law of Congress requiring a test oath, in order that rebels might fill these offices, and on the false pretense that loyal men could not be found qualified to fill them in a country which furnished more than forty thousand loyal white soldiers during the war. As might naturally be expected under this system of reconstruction, loyal men are more unsafe in the revolted districts now than they were before the war, while the condition of the negroes in very many localities is more pitifully deplorable than that of their former slavery. So intense and wide spread is the feeling of hostility to the Union in these regions that loyalty is branded as both a crime and a disgrace, while even Wilkes Booth is regarded as a martyr, and his pictures hang in the parlors of "southern gentlemen" whose children are called by his name.

Nor am I surprised at the audacity of the rebel leaders. Neither do I complain, or blame them. They do not disguise their real character and opinions, because they have been made sure of the executive favor. With the President resolutely on the side of Congress in this crisis, a very different exhibition of feeling and policy would have been developed in the South. The danger now at our doors would never have appeared. The prospect of another bloody war to complete the work which we supposed already accomplished would never have alarmed the country. The President has deserted the loyal millions who crushed the rebel cause at the end of a conflict of four years and joined himself to that very cause which is now borrowing new life from the fertilizing sunshine of his favor, reasserting its old heresies, and renewing its treasonable demands. This is at once the root and source of our present national troubles, the prophecy and parent of whatever calamity may come. The President not only opposes the will of the nation, the policy of the nation, as expressed through Congress, but he brands as traitors before a rebel mob leading and representative men in both Houses, who are as guiltless of treason as the great majority with whom they act. Not content with the good fellowship of the men who began the war and fought us with matchless desperation to the end, he unites with them in branding loyalty itself as treason, while he employs the power and patronage of his high office in rewarding his minions, and opposing the very men who made him their standard-bearer along with Abraham Lincoln, in the faith that his loyalty was unselfish and sincere. In fact, every phase of the presidential policy, as latterly displayed, confounds the difference between loyal and disloyal men, and gives aid and comfort to the rebels by mitigating or removing the just consequences of their crimes.

Mr. Speaker, this policy, utterly fatal to the nation's peace, as I have shown, must be abandoned. The Government cannot wholly undo the mistakes of the past, but it can do much for the future, and save the loyal cause, if the people, who see the threatened danger, will set themselves to work so resolutely as to compel a change. In God's name, let this be done. Let the people speak, for the power is in their hands, and if faithful now, as they proved themselves during the war, justice will prevail. Let them thunder it in the ears of the President that the nation cannot be saved, nor the fruits of our victory gathered, if in the settlement of this bloody conflict with treason right and wrong are confounded, and public justice trampled down. This is the duty of the loyal millions; and here lies the danger of the hour. It is just as impossible for the country to prosper if it shall sanction the present policy of the Executive, as it is for a man to violate a law of his physical being and escape the consequences. The demands of justice are as inexorable as the demands of natural law in the material world; and the moral distinctions which God himself has established cannot be slighted with the least possible impunity by individuals or nations. There is a difference, heaven-wide, between fighting for a slave empire and fighting for freedom and the universal rights of man. The cause of treason and the cause of loyalty are not the same. Perjury is not as honorable as keeping a man's oath. The black flag of slavery and treason was not as noble a standard to follow as that of the stars and stripes. The leading traitors of the South should not have the same honorable treatment and recognition as the patriot heroes of the Union. The grandest assassins and cut-throats of history should not defraud the gallows, while ordinary murderers are hung. Jefferson Davis should not have the same honorable place in history as George Washington. Benedict Arnold was not the beau ideal of a patriot, nor was Judas Iscariot "a high-souled gentleman and a man of honor," nor even "a misguided citizen of his country who engaged in a mistaken cause." The green mounds under which sleep our slaughtered heroes are not to have any moral comparison with the graves of traitors. The "throng of dead, led by Stonewall Jackson," are not to "contribute equally with the noble spirits of the North to the renown of our great Republic." Truth and falsehood, right and wrong, heaven and hell, are not mere names which signify nothing, but they pertain to the great verities of the universe; and the throne of God itself is immovable, only because its foundations are justice.

Mr. Speaker, I now move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. On that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I would like to make some remarks in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.]

The SPEAKER. The House is acting at present under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot do that. The motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of States and Territories in inverted order, commencing with the Territory of Montana, for the introduction of resolutions.

MONTANA TERRITORIAL LIBRARY.

Mr. McLAIN presented a joint memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Montana, asking Congress for an appropriation for a territorial library, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

ANNEXATION TO IDAHO.

Mr. McLAIN also presented a joint memorial of the Territorial Legislature of Montana, protesting against a joint resolution asking for the annexation of a certain portion of said Territory to the Territory of Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a bill appropriating certain proceeds of internal revenue in the Territory of Nebraska, for the purpose of erecting a penitentiary and completing the capitol in said Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION OF WAGON ROAD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a wagon road from Columbus, Nebraska, to Virginia City, in Montana Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTES IN NEVADA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Nevada in favor of the establishment of a daily mail between the city of Austin, in the county of Lander, and Silver Peak, in Esmeralda county, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada in favor of a weekly mail from Lone to Crystal Springs, in said State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

BRANCH MINT IN NEVADA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada in relation to the building of a United States mint in Carson City in said State; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada in relation to the trial of Jefferson Davis; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada on the subject of the sale of mineral lands; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR HORSES.

Mr. WHALEY introduced a bill in relation to claims for horses turned over to the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JUDGMENTS OF COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. BIDWELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the propriety of providing by law that hereafter whenever any person subject to the Rules and Articles of War shall be tried by court-martial for any alleged offense, and the finding of the court shall be that the person tried is not guilty of the charge or charges against him, the president and judge advocate or recorder of the court shall give a written certificate of acquittal to the accused, who shall then be released from arrest or confinement.

INTERNAL REVENUE FRAUDS.

Mr. HIGBY. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas it is alleged in responsible public journals and elsewhere that in the enforcement of the revenue laws at the custom-houses in Boston and New York, and the adjustment of claims for the violation thereof, frauds have been committed upon the United States, and parties involved in said alleged violations; and whereas it is in like manner alleged that similar frauds have been committed in the enforcement of the internal revenue laws, and in the adjustment of claims for the violation thereof in said cities: Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate all such alleged frauds, and that for that purpose they be authorized to send for persons and papers, and, if necessary, to sit during the recess of Congress, at such place as they shall deem most economical and efficient, and by such number, not exceeding three, of said committee, as they may deem advisable.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST VENEZUELA.

Mr. DRIGGS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this House with a list of the claims of citizens of the United States now pending in the United States legation at Caracas against the United States of Venezuela with a brief indication of the causes of complaint, and the reasons why payments have not been enforced during a long series of years, and what measures are necessary to bring these long-deferred claims to a speedy close.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ST. JOSEPH MISSOURI.

Mr. LOAN introduced a bill declaring St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ST. LOUIS WHARF.

Mr. BLOW introduced a bill to allow the extension of the wharf at St. Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the joint committee on reconstruction to report a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It is as follows:

A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of male citizens shall bear to the whole number of such male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt, or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that this joint resolution be postponed until Tuesday of next week after the reading of the Journal, and be made the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of, and that it be printed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to inquire whether this report of the committee on reconstruction is intended to supersede the special report lately made in reference to the State of Tennessee; or whether that special report is to be first considered and disposed of before this shall be reached.

Mr. STEVENS. This does not supersede that; if the House shall choose, that special report can be taken up at any time. I move that the joint resolution just reported be made the special order for Tuesday of next week after the reading of the Journal, and that it be printed.

Mr. ROSS. I have no objection to this being made the special order at the time indicated, subject to the prior consideration of the tariff and revenue bills, if they come up previously.

The SPEAKER. This must be made a special order or not; it cannot depend upon a contingency.

Mr. ROSS. Then I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have named.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 89, noes 20.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 20, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plant, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Coffroth, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Latham, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Ross, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, and Winfield—20.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Davis, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, LeBlond, McCallough, McIndoe, Mercer, Myers, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Patterson, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, and Wright—56.

So the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, two thirds voting in the affirmative.

During the roll-call,

Mr. THAYER said: My colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, is detained from the House in consequence of indisposition; he is paired on all political questions with my colleague, Mr.

RANDALL.

Mr. ANCONA said: My colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, is paired with Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts.

The result of the vote was announced as above.

The question was taken upon postponing the further consideration of the joint resolution till Tuesday of next week, after the reading of the Journal, and making it the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of; and it was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I am also instructed by the joint committee on reconstruction to report a bill to provide for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights.

The bill was read a first and second time. It is as follows:

A bill to provide for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights.

Whereas it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights; and whereas the Congress did, by joint resolution, propose for ratification to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, an article in the following words, to wit:

ARTICLE.—

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till Wednesday of next week, after the reading of the Journal, and be made the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of, and be printed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended for that purpose.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in the affirmative, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly postponed until Wednesday of next week, after the reading of the Journal, and made the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of, and was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I am further instructed by the same committee to report a bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States.

The bill was read a first and second time. It is as follows:

A bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person shall be eligible to any office under the Government of the United States who is included in any of the following classes, namely:

1. The president and vice president of the confederate States of America, so called, and the heads of departments thereof.
2. Those who in other countries acted as agents of the confederate States of America, so called.
3. Heads of Departments of the United States, officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, and all persons educated at the Military or Naval Academy of the United States, judges of the courts of the United States, and members of either House of the Thirty-Sixth Congress of the United States who gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.
4. Those who acted as officers of the confederate States of America, so called, above the grade of colonel in the army or master in the navy, and any one who, as Governor of either of the so-called confederate States, gave aid or comfort to the rebellion.
5. Those who have treated officers or soldiers or sailors of the Army or Navy of the United States, captured during the late war, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Thursday of next week, after the reading of the Journal, and be made the special order for that day, and from day to day until disposed of, and that it be printed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of making it a special order for Thursday week next.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were then suspended.

The bill was ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday week next, after the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I am directed by the committee to say that it is designed, as soon as the testimony is printed, that a short report will be made by the committee in furtherance of the objects now reported.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. ROSS. Is that report in order?

The SPEAKER. The committee have a right to report for commitment, but not for action.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. STEVENS. I present a substitute for House bill No. 63, to double the pensions of those who were pensioners by the casualties of the late war, and to pay the damages done to loyal men by the rebel government and rebel raiders, and to enforce the confiscation laws so as to pay the same out of the confiscated property of the enemy, and move that it be printed.

There was no objection, and the substitute was received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution calling for information:

Whereas the House did, by resolution dated March 5, 1866, request the President to inform them how many pardons had been granted by him, to whom, and for what offenses, and how much forfeited property had been restored to rebel owners, and to whom, to which no answer has yet been returned: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be requested at his earliest convenience to communicate said information, as it is needed for the purposes of legislation.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, [Mr. PRICE,] who has been called away, desired I should move, which I do, that he be excused from further service on the committee of conference in reference to the sale of liquor in the Capitol.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. GRINNELL to fill the vacancy.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, stated to me that he would be absent to-day, and I move that he be excused from further service on the same committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. DAWSON to fill the vacancy.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. BERGEN, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TABER for one week.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, leave of absence was granted to him for ten days.

On motion of Mr. THAYER, leave of absence was granted to him for one week.

A PAIR.

Mr. ELDRIDGE stated that he understood Mr. ROGERS was paired with Mr. HULBURD.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ELIOT moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Objection was made.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The question was taken; and there were, upon a division—ayes 72, noes 28.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds voting in the affirmative, and the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 492, being the river and harbor bill.

The House proceeded to consider the bill, which was read in full.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Marchant & Co., and P. Rosecrans, leaving copies of the same.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL FRY.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] yield to me a moment?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I hold in my hand a letter from Provost Marshal General Fry, which I ask to have read, at the Clerk's desk for the double purpose of vindicating myself from the charge of having stated in debate last week what was false, and also for the purpose, which I am sure will commend itself to the House, of allowing fair play to an honorable man in the same forum in which he has been assailed.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to have it read. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. I infer that this has some reference to me. I shall make no objection provided I may have an opportunity to reply to whatever the letter may call for hereafter.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope this will be postponed until we get through this bill. I object to interrupting it in this way.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to suspend the rules to allow it to be read.

The SPEAKER. The House is now engaged in the consideration of a bill brought up under a suspension of the rules; it cannot, therefore, suspend the rules to consider another matter.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. ELIOT. The Committee on Commerce have deemed it to be their duty to offer this bill at this time for the consideration of the House and for their favorable action, and, as they believe, for the promotion of the common welfare. The Constitution of the United States empowers it, the people demand it, and the necessities of the public require it. We ask for the expenditure of money and we believe that it can be shown that every dollar of appropriation asked for will, if judiciously applied, return thirty-fold into the Treasury of the United States. The time has come when loyal people look to Congress for help in the direction of this bill. During all the war the Committee on Commerce have persistently refused to report any bill on this subject although petitions have been before them time and again. And the people have been content; they have been expending life and treasure to save the life of the nation. The work of war has called them from their homes. That work has been well accomplished and thoroughly. And now from every loyal section of the land petitions have come up demanding the action of Congress in behalf of works where the highest industrial interests of the country are involved.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to discuss the rightful power of Congress under the Constitution to legislate in this manner. It would seem as though that question ought to be deemed settled. It has been discussed for many years by the ablest men who have represented their various constituencies upon this floor and in the Senate. Whatever theorists may say, I believe that it is certain that the practical common sense of this country demands and will receive but one solution.

Perhaps, however, I may say, in reporting this bill, that the Committee on Commerce have been guided somewhat by the principles of a resolution which obtained the sanction of this House nearly twenty years ago, to which I will refer. On the 21st, of December, 1847, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the General Government has the power to construct such harbors and improve such rivers as are necessary and proper for the protection of our Navy and of our commerce, and also for the defenses of our country."

The principle of that resolution covers the appropriations called for in this bill, and I find while on the vote taken on the resolution the names of Jacob Thompson and others of that class are recorded in the negative, that besides the names of several gentlemen who are here upon the floor who are recorded in the affirmative, there were three not here who gave to that resolution, and to the principle of the resolution, the authority of their distinguished names. I refer to John Quincy Adams, Abraham Lincoln, and Andrew Johnson, all of whom sustained the resolution in the terms which I have read.

Nearly forty years ago Mr. Webster emphatically gave his opinion, which he said had been expressed some twenty years before that time, in favor of the general power of Congress, and of the policy of its exercise by the Government.

I hold in my hand an extract from Mr. Webster, which I will read. It is as follows:

"Congress has power to regulate commerce, both internal and external, and whatever might have been thought to be the literal interpretation of these terms we know the construction to have been, from the very first assembling of Congress, and by the very men who framed the Constitution, that the regulation of commerce comprehended such measures as were necessary for its support, its improvement, its advancement, and justified such expenditures as piers, beacons, and light-houses, and the clearing out of harbors required. Instances of this sort in the application of the general revenue have been frequent from the commencement of the Government. As the same form, precisely, exists in relation to internal as well as external trade it was not easy to see why like expenditures might not be justified when made on internal objects. The vast regions of the West are penetrated by rivers to which those of Europe are but as rills and brooks. But the navigation of those noble streams, washing as they do the margin of one third of the States of the Union, was obstructed by obstacles capable of being removed, and yet not likely to be removed but by the power of the General Government. Was this a justifiable object of expenditure from the national Treasury? Without hesitation I have thought it was. A vast chain of lakes, if it be not more proper to call them a succession of inland seas, stretches into the deep interior of this northern part of the continent, as if kindly placed there by Providence to break the continuity of the land, and afford the easier and readier intercourse of water conveyance. But these vast lakes required also harbors and lights and breakwaters. And were those lawful objects of national legislation? To me, certainly, they have appeared to be such as clearly as if they were on the Atlantic border."

The First Congress committed the Government to the policy of the bill. The act passed on the 7th of August, 1789, the act referred to by Mr. Webster, and which was approved by George Washington, for the establishment of light-houses, beacon-buoys, and public piers, was a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution admitting the power of Congress to legislate for rendering the navigation of inlets, or harbors, or ports of the United States easy and safe. There was little internal commerce at that time and our foreign commerce was very limited; and yet, in 1790, Congress enacted and passed another law. In August, 1790, an appropriation was made for the security of navigation. In March, 1791, in April, 1792, in June, 1794, and in March, 1795, other laws were passed upon the same general subject. In March, 1796, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Oliver Wolcott, recommended an appropriation of $16,000 for four new piers in the Delaware river, and in April, 1798, a further sum of $60,000 was recommended for the same purpose. The reasons given by Mr. Wolcott in the report which he made are of great significance at this time. They will be found in the Report on Commerce and Navigation for that year, volume one, page 390. He says:

"A question arises whether expenses of the nature proposed ought to be general or whether they ought to be delayed by a duty imposed on tonnage of vessels employed in the river Delaware. On this point it is respectfully suggested that though it may be difficult to form general rules by which to determine in all cases what establishments ought to be supported at the expense of the United States, and that though it is certain that many of the bays, rivers, and harbors of this country are susceptible of improvements which it would be inexpedient for the Government to undertake, especially at present, yet it is equally certain that national interests of the first importance are concentrated in the principal commercial cities which cannot, consistently with public interests, be submitted to the direction of local policy. The Secretary has considered the river Delaware, below Philadelphia, as entitled in respect to establishments for the security of navigation to the same consideration as any part of the coast adjoining the high sea. The proposed piers will be useful to foreign vessels and to American vessels from all the States. Commercial ports upon the river within the jurisdiction of three States will, in proportion to the extent of their trade, be nearly as much benefited by the establishments which are desired as the port of Philadelphia."

Now, we have at this time many "Delaware rivers," rivers and harbors in the interior which were then hardly known, but which have become now of as much relative national value as the river Delaware was at that time, and the arguments applicable to that river are all with the same force applicable to those covered by this bill, and every appropriation which we ask for here comes fairly within the principle upon which the old Delaware appropriation stood. The laws, during our early history, concerned light-houses, buoys, piers, &c., but as the wants of commerce increased, as the nation grew in resources, other laws were passed applying more generally the same principle. In April, 1798, a law was passed to stake out the channel of Warren river, Rhode Island, and moneys were appropriated for similar purposes in May, 1802, and March, 1805. After that time during different years other appropriations were made for like purposes in States upon the sea-board and away from the sea-board, but all for the general objects indicated in the first act approved by Washington.

I have here a report made by General Delafield at this session, in reply to a communication which I was directed by the Committee on Commerce to address to the Secretary of War, and which will be found as Executive Document No. 18, and if gentlemen will examine it they will find that from 1824 down to 1856, appropriations were made for building piers, for building break-waters, for removing obstructions in rivers, for improving harbors, for improving navigation, for deepening channels, for the preservation of harbors, and for the construction of sea-walls. I believe that these will be found to embrace substantially all the classes of appropriations which are contained in this bill. The years when these appropriations were made will be found upon examination of this same document to cover the Administrations of Presidents Monroe and John Quincy Adams, of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Tyler. During the early history of our Government we had comparatively no inland commerce, no lakes valuable for commerce; we had no valley of the Mississippi; we had no West; but all that was wanted was done.

The State of Illinois, if I recollect aright, was admitted into the Union in the year 1818. That State, young as she is, was six years old before a dollar of money was appropriated by the General Government for the improvement of harbors upon the classic waters of Lake Erie. There have been during these latter years other waters which have been dyed red with patriot blood; there have been other battle-fields than those thereabout where the blood of Union men has been freely poured out to save the nation. But yet, during all the life of the nation to come, I believe we shall turn back to no waters with more pride than to those where Perry first achieved his brilliant victory, the waters of Lake Erie. It would have been well if the Government of the United States had looked to that lake some years before it did. In 1824 the first appropriation was made.

During the war of 1812, as you know, Great Britain proposed to hold command of Lake Erie, and with her squadron there was blockading the port of Erie. Perry was stationed upon those waters to defend the interests of the United States. He then contrived to build and equip his small fleet within the harbor at that port; the British squadron being outside the bar in the deep waters of the lake, and his vessels within. His fleet at last was ready, but the Niagara and the Lawrence could not move because there was a bar which the Government had not yet seen fit to remove. It so happened that the British commander hoisted sail and went off one day with his squadron, leaving Perry, who had been providing some means to get his vessels over the bar, to execute his purpose if he could. With the greatest labor the Lawrence and the Niagara were lightened of their armaments, and means were used, which the skillful commander had before provided, by which the vessels were lifted over the bar and floated in the deep waters of the lake. Before the British squadron returned, the American fleet was prepared for its reception; and well we know that it was not long afterward that the battle of Lake Erie was fought and Perry's victory was won.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of two courses must be taken. Either the Government must lift up its hand from the sea-coast and from lake and from river; it must say to the people, "You have fought for and made the nation and saved its life; but now within your own State borders you must protect and take care of your own interests;" or else the sea-coast, East and West, so far as it shall be necessary for the security of navigation, and the mighty rivers and the great lakes of the continent must be cleared of their obstructions and their harbors rendered secure, so that they may be entered with safety by the vessels of the United States and by the vessels of commerce, and I hope the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress will upon this question be found upon the side of the people.

Sir, if the action of the early Government and of our early Presidents appropriating moneys for roads and canals and the various improvements of rivers, then of some commercial value, and of harbors on the sea-coast, was pursuant to constitutional powers granted or fairly implied, the question must be deemed fairly settled, and at this time the demands of more millions of men whose interests are involved in one improvement than achieved our independence cannot be properly denied.

In one appropriation asked for here, more than five million people are directly interested. And yet the States where they live are mere children in the Union—hardy young ones and hard strikers—they have done some splendid fighting during these four years past; they have sent their hundreds of thousands of men to help save that flag, and we should see to it that it shall securely wave over their lakes and rivers.

Sir, we have seven great lakes: Superior, Huron, Michigan, St. Clair, Erie, Ontario, and Champlain. Without estimating at all the rivers and the canals which connect those lakes, it will be found that there is a straight line of lake navigation of one thousand five hundred and seventy-three miles in length. But that does not state the whole truth, for the lake coast is five thousand miles in extent, of which three thousand miles are within the territory of the United States.

Leaving the lakes and going to the rivers, we find that, taking the rivers Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, Ohio, and Red river, with their tributaries, we have a length of navigable waters of sixteen thousand six hundred and seventy-four miles. The inestimable national importance of the navigation of these lakes and rivers cannot be overstated. The whole Mississippi valley, with its fourteen States, the eight States upon the lakes, depend upon these lakes and rivers as their natural highways to a commercial market. We can estimate the present commercial value of the products of the West; but we cannot tell how that value will be multiplied. Yet for many years from the time when the last general bill passed by Congress found its death in the President's portfolio, every dollar of appropriation has been earned by the earnest advocates of these improvements before it was authorized by Congress and became a law.

I do not propose to occupy the time of the House now by reviewing at any length the action of Congress upon the subject of river and harbor improvement. And yet it may be well to recur to that action briefly, and I propose to do so.

In 1808 Albert Gallatin's famous report was made, recommending a grand appropriation of $20,000,000 for turnpike roads, canals, and inland navigation. Within the range of his recommendations were immensely long public roads and canals running north and south, and east and west. There were large appropriations recommended for improving the navigation of the great rivers. That recommendation of Mr. Gallatin was not acted upon.

It will be remembered that shortly after that time there were heard in the air the distant mutterings of thunder. Soon afterward a cloud not bigger than a man's hand was seen. The eyes of all and the attention of all were directed to what was to come. The war with England, which followed, put a stop to appropriations of that description. But from about 1808 until the presidential term of Mr. Tyler, through contest and through tribulation, and notwithstanding now and then a presidential veto, appropriations to the following amounts, according to a very valuable report made by Colonel Abert to the War Department, were made: during the presidential term of Mr. Jefferson, $48,500; during the term of Mr. Madison, $250,800; during the term of Mr. Monroe, $707,621; during the term of Mr. John Quincy Adams, $2,310,475; during the term of General Jackson, $10,582,882; during the term of Mr. Van Buren, $2,222,544; during the term of Mr. Tyler, $1,076,500.

President Tyler, in his annual message to the Twenty-Eighth Congress, made at its first session, strongly recommended to the attention of Congress the western lakes and rivers. During that same session, however, he declined to sign, but returned with his veto, a bill providing appropriations for eastern harbors, known on the records of that day as the "eastern harbor bill;" while he signed a bill for improvements of western lakes and rivers. At the last session of the same Congress, a joint bill covering the East and the West was passed by Congress. The years upon the passage of that bill were, as the record shows, 105; the nays were 96. The Senate passed it by 27 yeas to 11 nays. Among the names of those who supported the bill, I find upon the Journal that of our distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] now at the head of the Military Committee, and also that of the gentleman from Chicago, [Mr. WENTWORTH.] Within ten days afterward Mr. Tyler's term expired; and so did the Congress during which the bill was passed; and the bill remained unsigned in the portfolio of the President.

I have referred, Mr. Speaker, to the report of Colonel Albert. His report, as chief of Engineers, was communicated to Congress by Mr. Polk in his first message; and the attention of Congress was invited to the suggestions which it contained. Colonel Albert called especial attention to the lake navigation, and described with a good deal of force the wants, the commerce, and the national value of the harbors of the lakes.

Colonel Albert says:

"We see the immense wealth and prosperity which these harbors have developed and the immense national interests which require protection—interests of commerce and interests of national defense, protection to vast amounts of property, to numbers of lives, and to a powerful auxiliary in time of war. Now, what is the protection which these vast national interests require? Harbors, only harbors, means of entering places of security to load and unload and for shelter in time of storms. Our Atlantic coast, more favorably situated in some respects, calls for protection in the form of costly fortifications and of numerous troops. Our lake coast, as extensive as that of the Atlantic, is deficient in harbors and places of refuge. It calls comparatively but for small protection in the way of fortifications, but it calls for protection from storms and for facilities to enter the harbors."

Well, sir, Congress did attend to the recommendations of the President, and to the suggestions made in that report; and during that Congress a bill was passed to protect the national interests referred to. There are now some three or four gentlemen upon the floor who supported that bill. Among them I find the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and his colleague, [Mr. DELANO,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GOODYEAR,] the gentleman from Chicago, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRIDER.] Jefferson Davis voted in the negative.

There were forty-nine appropriations contained in that bill. All of them except fourteen were for improvements of the same character as those which had been approved by General Jackson during his presidential term.

Mr. Polk vetoed the bill in July or August, 1846, and another smaller bill, which was passed toward the close of the next session, found its death in the drawer of the President.

At the next session, December, 1847, bringing it down to the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, an elaborate message was sent to Congress, in which forner arguments against the protection of national interests of commerce were repeated at great length. In 1848 the House passed another bill covering the same general ground. It was reported to the Senate on the last day of the session, after having passed the House, and failed there for want of time.

There was a valuable bill passed in 1852, and in the report which I have referred to from General Delafield will be found the appropriations contained in that bill.

Since then there have been several special bills, notwithstanding the vetoes of the President, which have become laws. I hold in my hand three bills passed during the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, one to deepen the channels over the flats in St. Mary's river, Michigan, another to remove obstructions to navigation in the mouth of the Mississippi river at South Pass and Pass à l'Ouvre, and the other for deepening the channel over the St. Clair flats, Michigan. These failed to receive the sanction of President Pierce, but were passed by the Senate over the veto in July, 1856, and two days afterward, I believe, were passed by the House.

There was another bill, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, for the improvement of the Des Moines rapids, Mississippi river. That was not fortunate enough to receive the President's signature, was returned to the House on the 11th of August, 1856, and passed the House the same day and the Senate on the 16th of August.

At the end of the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress a bill was passed and returned to the House of Representatives without his signature. At the beginning of the second session of the same Congress reasons were communicated at length and the same argument presented so often made before and so often answered by the ablest expounders of the Constitution.

In 1866, we proposed to ascertain, on the principle of the resolution I referred to at the commencement of my remarks, whether, after four years of war, when loyal men of the East and West have given their fortunes and their lives to the support, rescue, and preservation of the Government, something may not be done that will enrich the people and the Government at the same time.

Is this work national or sectional? I cannot, of course, examine into the details of the items contained in this bill, but there is no item that cannot be defended upon its own independent ground. There is no one which does not rest upon estimates carefully made at the War Department. If it shall be necessary, I hold myself prepared, in behalf of the committee, to justify each specific appropriation.

I want now to speak of two items, one concerning the Mississippi river, and the other concerning the St. Clair flats.

There are four appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi river, one at its mouth, one at the Des Moines rapids, one at Rock Island rapids, and one for the procurement and use of snag boats to remove obstructions in western rivers.

I say that it is a national disgrace that the Mississippi river has been left so long comparatively valueless; not absolutely, for it would not be possible that the "Father of Waters" could be made absolutely valueless, notwithstanding the fact that there are at the Des Moines rapids, the Rock Island rapids, and possibly higher up and before you reach St. Paul, obstructions which, during a great portion of the year, greatly, and at times wholly, impede the navigation of the river. It is not only the largest of North American rivers, but, if we consider it in reference to its tributaries and to its wonderful commercial facilities, it is the greatest river in the world. The remotest source of the Mississippi river is no less than three thousand one hundred and sixty miles above the Gulf, at Lake Itasca. For how many centuries that river has poured its waters into the Gulf no man knows, but history tells us that in 1520, a century before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, the Spanish mariner Pinédo sailed around the Gulf and saw what he called a "little sea," and a mighty river entering in, which he called the "river of the Holy Ghost." And from that time visited as is supposed by early Spanish and French mariners in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries among whom were Narvaez, De Soto, Marquette, and La Salle, its stream has rolled for two thousand miles, passing at several points over ledges of rock where navigation is made impossible at times, and is always unsafe and dangerous. At these rapids the rocks must be removed if no better way can be found to make safe the navigation and protect the commerce of the Mississippi. It was Father Marquette, a Jesuit priest, who gave or rather who fixed the name which the Indians had before that time given to that mighty river. The men who thought they had discovered the river attempted to fasten upon it other names, but the old Ojibbeway name of Mississippi was put into the books by Father Marquette, and the river has borne that name and must bear it forever. This bill introduces the name of that same Jesuit priest in another connection. I suppose that it is the same man after whom the harbor is named for which an appropriation will be found in this bill, the harbor of Marquette on Lake Superior.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the attention of the House to some practical and pretty important facts going to show the national importance of these proposed appropriations. Twenty-five years ago all the New-England States, with Pennsylvania and New York, had a population of about six million five hundred thousand. A census taken this day, after four years of war, will show in the seven States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, and Minnesota, a population of not less than ten millions. At the Detroit convention which was held in July, 1865, Mr. James F. Joy, of Detroit, referring to the agricultural growth of those seven States, said:

"Contrast now the progress of agriculture between the two sections. All the Atlantic States named in 1850 produced 20,000,000 bushels wheat, and in 1860 had increased the production only 2,000,000 and risen to 22,000,000. In the same years the lake States (above named) had produced 40,000,000 in 1850 and 85,000,000 in 1860 of wheat. Of corn, the former States produced, in 1850, 47,000,000, and in 1860 57,000,000 bushels. The lake States produced in 1850, of corn, 185,000,000 bushels, and in 1860 319,000,000, and at the same rate of increase will in ten years more produce about 200,000,000 bushels of wheat and 600,000,000 bushels of corn." * * * "Now, there are ten million people interested in these products, and to them the matter of access to market is of the first and last importance." * * * "It is not the possibility of getting to market through avenues now open but the expense of so doing which is involved. Every additional avenue aids the facilities and diminishes the expense." * * * "With the millions of the West the avenue to market is a vital question. When close upon the Mississippi corn is burned for fuel, because the expense of sending it to market is more than it is worth; when from Illinois, on an average, it costs the farmer three bushels to get the fourth to market in New York, and much more than that to lay it down in Liverpool; when from all the lake States it costs half of all the flour and wheat to the farmer to get the rest into the markets of the world, it has become high time for the Government to look a little to the protection of his interests."

But, Mr. Speaker, although these seven States that I have named are all more or less interested in these Mississippi river improvements, there are five States whose interests are directly and vitally concerned. I refer to Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

In presenting to the House the national importance of these appropriations, I certainly cannot do better than to refer to some facts which were laid before the convention held in February, 1866, at Dubuque, Iowa. My friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has furnished me with a copy of the proceedings of that convention; and I will read some extracts from a speech made by Mr. Robb, of the Dubuque Produce Exchange:

"The importance of this question, and the magnitude of the interests involved in its solution, will more clearly appear on an examination of the productiveness of the five States named. In 1860 the whole number of acres of improved land in all the States and Territories was..... 163,261,389

Of this—
Missouri contained.....	6,246,871
Illinois.....	13,251,473
Iowa.....	8,780,233
Wisconsin.....	3,746,036
Minnesota.....	654,397
	27,579,030

Or a fraction less than one sixth.

"The total value of crops for 1864 is estimated by the Agricultural Bureau of the Department of the Interior to have been.....$1,564,543,690

Of this sum—
Illinois produced.....	$214,488,426
Wisconsin.....	51,938,352
Missouri.....	62,903,562
Iowa.....	74,100,431
Minnesota.....	13,168,123
	403,692,474

Or more than one fourth of the value of the entire crops of the country. But these estimates of value are the estimated value of the various products in the States where produced. In this way the value of articles in the above States appears to a great disadvantage, because being so far from market, they are rated much less than the same articles in other States, especially those near the sea-board. The same is true of the estimated value of the live stock, which, on the 1st of January, 1865, was, $990,879,128

Of this—
Illinois had.....	$116,588,288
Missouri.....	44,431,766
Iowa.....	60,572,496
Wisconsin.....	36,911,165
Minnesota.....	8,890,015
	273,363,730

Or more than one fourth. A juster standard by which to measure the productiveness of these States would be a comparison of the amount of their respective products, since the value is so largely affected by the distance from market.

"The great staples of agriculture are wheat, corn, beef, and pork. Comparing these, we find that the total number of bushels of wheat produced in all the States and Territories in 1864 (except the cotton States, whose production was almost nominal, probably not more than one sixth of what it was in 1860) was.....160,695,823

Missouri.....	3,291,514
Wisconsin.....	14,168,517
Iowa.....	12,649,807
Minnesota.....	2,634,975
	66,105,786

Or a fraction less than one half. The total number of bushels of corn produced was.....530,451,403

Illinois produced.....	133,356,135
Missouri.....	86,635,031
Wisconsin.....	10,067,053
Iowa.....	55,201,240
Minnesota.....	4,047,329
	244,986,768

Or nearly one half. The whole number of cattle and oxen, January 1, 1865, was.....7,072,591

Illinois had.....	978,700
Missouri.....	471,006
Wisconsin.....	383,760
Iowa.....	561,338
Minnesota.....	127,175
	2,526,979

Or more than one third. The total number of hogs was.....13,070,887

Illinois had.....	2,034,231
Missouri.....	983,857
Wisconsin.....	340,633
Iowa.....	1,423,567
Minnesota.....	109,016
	4,896,506

Or more than one third. The entire population of the United States in 1860 was.....31,443,322

Illinois contained.....	1,711,651
Iowa.....	674,913
Missouri.....	1,182,012
Minnesota.....	172,123
Wisconsin.....	775,881
	4,516,880

Or about one seventh.

"Thus it will be seen that these five States possessing only one seventh of all the population and one sixth of all the improved land, nevertheless in 1864 produced more than one fourth in value of the entire crop; more than one fourth in value of all the live stock; more than one third in number of all the cattle and hogs, and nearly one half of all the wheat and corn grown in the United States. Here we find four and one half millions of agriculturists along the upper Mississippi, producing in a single year from one third to one half of all the production of the leading staples of an estimated value of $677,056,204."

"A glance at the commerce of the Mississippi will show how necessary it is that this work should be done immediately and effectually. Thirty years ago steamboats engaged in the river trade aggregated but a few score. Now there are over a thousand."

"In 1865 the imports of St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, and two or three minor Mississippi towns were of the value of $730,000,000. As the export trade of these places was about equal to their imports, we have for the entire commerce of these points nearly $1,500,000,000. But this does not include the commerce of New Orleans, Memphis, Dubuque, and other important towns. Include the trade of these points and the aggregate value of the trade of the Mississippi and its tributaries, the Ohio and Missouri, in 1865 was more than $2,000,000,000, a sum equivalent to three times the whole foreign commerce of the United States."

"Remove these obstructions and the producers of these States will then have a convenient and adequate outlet to the markets on our own sea-board and of Europe. They can market their grain in London and Liverpool, be successful competitors of European producers on their own soil, and eventually control the price of breadstuffs in the very center of the world's trade. In Europe land is scarce, and rents ruinously high. The consequence is that our farmers, who have cheap lands and mechanical labor, can produce grain with profit at figures that would ruin the European farmer. The only obstacle that prevents the western producer from underselling and by successful competition driving foreign producers from their own markets, is the want of cheap transportation. For the past five years the average price per bushel of wheat in London and Liverpool has been $1 37 in gold, or $1 90 of our own currency. The English farmer cannot produce it at a less cost with any profit. The land is mostly held by the nobility, who exact as a rental therefor forty per cent. of the productions. Improve these rapids, and grain can be sent from Dubuque to New Orleans for twenty cents and thence to Liverpool for seventeen cents, including cost of transhipment, thus netting our farmers at least $1 50 per bushel and giving them the power to undersell the English farmer in his own market, and eventually compel him to seek other pursuits. Wheat could be shipped from this point to New York for thirty-three cents per bushel by the way of New Orleans, while the average cost by present transportation from the Mississippi river to New York is sixty-five cents per bushel. Here is a saving of thirty-two cents per bushel. This on thirty million of our surplus crop of fifty million bushels annually raised, would make the enormous sum of $9,600,000."

Now, the total value of the crops for 1864 throughout the country is shown to have been $1,564,543,690. Of that immense amount the five States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota produced in value more than one fourth part. But that statement does not show the whole truth, because these values are values which are estimated in the States where these cereals are produced.

But in Boston, Massachusetts, corn last year was $1 21 per bushel; in Illinois, it was twenty-nine cents per bushel. It will be seen at once, therefore, that if those five States produced more than one fourth of the value of the whole crop of 1864, estimated at home prices, what an increased proportion would be shown if values were more equalized than they are now. I understand that at this moment there are in the State of Iowa twelve million acres of unimproved lands where the plow has never entered.

It is not possible, perhaps, to demonstrate more truly or clearly the national importance of these improvements; but still I desire to present further a few later statistics, which I have prepared from documents subsequently published. I want to call the attention of the House to one single crop, and that is the corn crop of 1865.

In Maine, the corn product in that year was 1,692,020 bushels; in New Hampshire, 1,468,090 bushels; in Vermont, 1,796,356; in Massachusetts, 2,363,245; in Rhode Island, 497,418; and in Connecticut, 2,265,818; making an aggregate of 10,082,947 bushels as the corn crop of these six States for 1865. Now, if you add to that the corn crop of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, you will have an aggregate of 170,688,279 bushels as the corn crop in that year of these nine States. The State of Illinois produced in the same year 177,095,852 bushels; that is to say, 7,000,000 bushels more than these nine States. Ohio yielded 94,119,644 bushels; Michigan, 17,520,305; Indiana, 116,069,316; Missouri, 52,021,715; Wisconsin, 13,449,405; Iowa, 62,997,818; and Minnesota, 5,577,795; making an aggregate of 538,851,845 bushels.

Now look at the values of corn in 1865:

States.	Per bushel.	Total value.
Maine.....	$1 21	$2,037,344
New Hampshire.....	1 21	1,732,729
Vermont.....	1 15	2,070,300
Massachusetts.....	1 104	2,611,385
Rhode Island.....	1 224	609,949
Connecticut.....	1 224	2,775,627
		$11,887,334

Ohio.....	444	$41,816,012
Michigan.....	601	10,706,850
Indiana.....	40 2-5	44,918,823
Illinois.....	294	51,800,536
Missouri.....	52	27,051,202
Wisconsin.....	46	6,200,726
Iowa.....	30	18,889,344
Minnesota.....	514	2,872,564
		$204,275,147

The whole value of the Illinois corn crop was $51,800,536. The whole value of the crop of the six New England States was $11,887,334, and yet those six States produced only one seventeenth as much as the crop of Illinois, while the value was between one fourth and one fifth.

Now, sir, to get a bushel of corn from Illinois to Boston would cost eighty-one and a quarter cents; that is to say, it would cost the difference between its value in the Boston market and its cost at home; to carry the corn crop of 1865 from Illinois to Massachusetts would cost $143,890,379 75.

The price in New York was ninety-five cents per bushel. The cost of getting a bushel of corn from Illinois to New York was sixty-five and three quarter cents, and the cost of transporting the corn crop of Illinois to New York city would be $116,440,522 69.

The whole crop of Illinois in 1865, taking the corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, tobacco, and hay was of the value of $116,274,321; that is to say, the whole crop was worth $166,201 69 less than the cost of transporting to New York the corn crop alone of 1865.

Now, with an unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi, that corn crop could be landed in New York city, at a saving of $63,311,769 09. In this estimate I have allowed thirty-five and three fourths cents as the cost of getting a bushel of corn down the Mississippi. But I received a letter this morning on that subject, some portions of which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE ST. LOUIS LEAD AND OIL COMPANY,
142 SECOND STREET, CORNER WASHINGTON AVENUE,
ST. LOUIS, April 26, 1866.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt this morning of a letter desiring me to transmit to you some information regarding present rates of freights from St. Louis to New Orleans, &c.

The present rates by steamers on grain and flour to New Orleans are: eighteen to twenty cents per bushel for grain and seventy cents per barrel for flour.

I am interested in a company lately formed for the purpose of transporting freight by barges towed by powerful tow-boats. Within the past three weeks we have sent out three tows of about four thousand tons each, and have been splendidly successful. A prejudice has always existed among our steamboat men and underwriters against this method of transportation, but it has been entirely overcome by the astonishingly successful operation of our theory; our boats making their trips in perfect safety and in less time than is generally required by passenger steamers. We are now taking freight to New Orleans at fifty cents per barrel for flour and twelve to fifteen cents per bushel for grain, and if the navigation of the upper Mississippi was not obstructed by rapids, and the lower river by snags and sawyers, it could undoubtedly be carried at these prices with profit, from St. Paul to New Orleans, over two thousand miles.

The advantage to the whole country by this method of transportation can readily be perceived, and its operations can be greatly facilitated and cheapened by the improvements contemplated in your bill; and I cannot conceive how any person having the interests of the whole country sincerely at heart could for a moment oppose it.

Yours, truly,

W. H. PULSIFER.

Hon. T. D. ELIOT, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Mr. ELIOT. The produce of the five States of Illinois, Missouri, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota in 1865 in cereals and potatoes was in bushels, 466,629,652. The produce of the same articles in the nine States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, was 321,494,867 bushels. That is to say, the nine eastern States produced less than the five Mississippi States by 145,131,285 bushels, and yet Illinois, the oldest of the five States named came into the Union in 1818, Missouri in 1821, Iowa in 1846, Wisconsin in 1848; while Minnesota did not begin to be a Territory until 1849, and was not a State until 1857.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] be extended for fifteen minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. ELIOT. The five Mississippi States to which I have referred are all of them younger than the State of Ohio, a great deal younger, and yet the first child born in the State of Ohio is now living in a very serene old age in his native State; and he does not now number so many years as may be counted by our friend, the patriarch of the Pennsylvania delegation, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Now, we on the sea-board want to have cheaper corn; and the people on the lakes and western rivers want to get more money for their produce. The surplus produce of those States in a few years will not only feed all the Atlantic States, but there will be enough left to affect the price of food in Europe.

I now want to say something in regard to the St. Clair flats. Let us see if that matter is national and important or not. I have in my hand a valuable report upon these flats, made by Colonel Graham, which will be found in volume five of Senate Documents of the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, in the year 1858. I read the following extracts:

"The immense amount of commerce before alluded to, and which is shown by the accompanying statistics to be dependent upon this channel for its prosperity, ought not to be subjected to so long a delay in securing its practical benefits.

"The States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and the Territory of Minnesota, have their shores washed by the great inland seas; whose intercommunication by ship navigation is much interrupted by the want of a safe and sure channel over these flats.

"The States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and a portion of Michigan, on the one side, are crippled in their important commercial relations with the remaining portion of the State of Michigan, and with the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and the Territory of Minnesota, on the other side, by this intervening obstacle.

"Something would seem, then, under the purview of the Constitution, to be necessary to be done in order to regulate the commerce between these States. Viewed in this light the subject becomes one of great public concern. The value of the articles of commerce and navigation which passed over these flats during the two hundred and thirty days of open navigation in the year 1855, say between the middle of April and the 1st of December, will be presently shown to have amounted to the immense sum of $250,721,455 50, that is to say, two hundred and fifty-nine millions seven hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty cents, or per day during the navigable season $1,123,223 72. The improvement, then, when undertaken should be executed with a degree of permanency and celerity combined commensurate with its importance and the magnitude of the interests involved.

"It is making no more than a reasonable allowance for the effect of the obstruction to commerce now existing at St. Clair flats to say that had that obstruction not existed the value of the merchandise and produce that would have passed in 1855 would have been full fifty per cent. more than it actually was, or that it would have amounted during the navigable season of 1855 to $376,751,538 95. This would have been an average value per day of $1,083,030 25, or per day more than three times the estimated cost of the work to be done in a permanent manner, and with a channel-way six hundred feet wide and full twelve feet deep. It should be borne in mind that such a channel would admit as free and safe a navigation at night as during the day. In the present state of the flats no navigator ever thinks of attempting to pass them, except by daylight. This cause of detention, added to that of vessels grounded often for several days before they can be got afloat and tugged over, actually shortens the navigable season to quite one half of what it will be when the improvement shall be completed in the manner that shall best obviate all the difficulties."

Now, what are these St. Clair flats, and where are they? Lake St. Clair, which connects by means of the Detroit and St. Clair rivers the three lakes of Huron, Michigan, and Erie, is eighteen miles in length, and has a mean width of about twelve miles. The St. Clair flats are at the head of the lake. At the point where the river widens itself into a lake and forms the lake, sands brought down by the flow of the river are accumulated. The flats or sand-bars are made in that way; and a channel of about one mile in length must be cut through. For the last ten years nothing has been done by the Government; nothing since the date of the report from which I have just read.

At that time a channel was cut through one hundred feet wide and thirteen feet deep. That channel is said to be to-day about fifty feet wide and ten and a half feet deep. Now, the value of the commerce which during the last year passed over those flats was more than one hundred and forty-six million dollars. But that is exclusive of the value of the vessels, which amounted to $250,541,846; making the total value of the property which passed over those flats in one season to be $396,546,896.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement of this commerce over the flats. This statement, prepared by Mr. Edmund Trowbridge—a brother, I believe, of my friend from Michigan—conveys a very full and a very minute idea of the value of this improvement:

"At the time the above appropriation was made, 1857, the average carrying capacity of the vessels on the lakes was from ten to twelve thousand bushels of grain, but the rapid and enormous increase in the commerce of the lakes has made it necessary to build much larger vessels, and now it would be safe to say the average capacity of each is double that amount. Then the greatest amount of water that vessels could draw was from nine to ten feet, but now from twelve to thirteen and a half feet.

"It is no uncommon thing to see several of our largest propellers aground on the flats at one time, working all the powers of their engines to extricate themselves. The water being shallow, the action of their wheels digs up, as it were, the sand under them, and deposits it in small hills or ridges in the channel, on which the next passing vessel is likely to stick fast.

"The navigation of the rivers connecting Lakes Erie and Huron has always been attended with much risk, and often with serious loss, owing to shoals, sunken rocks, and swift currents, even before the vessels were anything like the size they now are. This has made it necessary to bring to the aid of sailing vessels tow-boats to tow them through these rivers. These boats take in tow from two to seven vessels, and in passing over the flats the tug, or some of the vessels in tow, are very apt to stick fast on some of these ridges, formed by the propeller wheels, or owing to the narrowness of the channel, they strike on one bank or the other, and, not having room to work these vessels, the consequence is, those astern are sure to come in collision with those aground, causing, in the aggregate, an immense amount of damage, all of which would be avoided by having a sufficient breadth and depth of channel through which to do the business. The channel is now so crooked that it requires an expert pilot to take any ordinary sized craft over.

"The extent of the bar or flat is very insignificant, and the amount of money required from the Government is a mere trifle, when compared with the importance of the work sought to be accomplished.

"The entire length that would be required to cut the channel would not exceed one mile. Your committee are informed by competent engineers in the Government employ that the small sum of $200,000 would give a channel three hundred feet wide and fifteen feet water.

"While your committee fully agree with and heartily indorse all the schemes proposed by conventions and Boards of Trade to enlarge our canals, build new ones, and open up greater facilities for getting the vast produce of the West to tide-water, they cannot but think that this work of enlarging the channel over the St. Clair flats is of quite as great importance as any that has been or can be proposed.

"As it is, one vessel can entirely close the channel by striking on one bank and swinging across the channel, thus effectually sealing it up, so far as the passage of other vessels is concerned; and your committee have known within the last two years a large propeller closing entirely the channel for four days, making it impossible for any loaded craft to pass or repass, and detaining at one time more than two hundred loaded vessels for that length of time. Your committee would recommend that an appropriation of $200,000 be asked from Congress to accomplish this much-needed work.

"Your committee would also recommend that an appropriation be asked from Congress of a sufficient amount of money to build three range lights on the flats, in accordance with the recommendation of Colonel William F. Reynolds, made to the Light-House Board, which would enable vessels to pass over the flats as well at night as in the day. The necessity for these range lights is proven from the fact that temporary ones have been kept there by private subscription since the channel was opened. If not for them there would be large accumulation of vessels above and below the flats during the night, and at the earliest daylight each would try to be the first over. They would meet on the flats in such numbers and to such an extent that there would be an almost interminable jam, and the damage from loss of time and collision would be incalculable.

"Hereafter your committee will show the number of vessels, with their cargoes, that have passed the flats during the season of 1855, with the valuation of the same as near as possible. In some instances we have been obliged to estimate the value of cargoes, but feel assured that our figures are below rather than above the actual value.

"When we think that there are no less than fifteen States of our Union directly or indirectly interested in the commerce of the lakes, it seems as though they could, by a united effort, demand of our Government that this barrier or obstruction should be removed, and that demand should not go unheeded.

"With the foregoing remarks your committee beg leave to offer their statistical report, and would earnestly recommend that the report, or so much of it as is necessary, may be laid before the different Boards of Trade around the lakes, asking their cooperation in bringing this important subject before Congress, with a recommendation that the appropriation of $200,000 be made to remove this barrier, and a further appropriation of $10,000 per year be made to keep the channel open and clear for all times.

E. TROWBRIDGE,
G. W. BISSELL,
P. J. RALPH.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seemed right to say thus much—it is only the beginning of what might be said concerning these improvements in the Mississippi and upon St. Clair flats to enable the naval and commercial vessels of the United States to navigate safely the lakes and the rivers of the West, and to enable the great agricultural interests of the country to add to the national wealth their heavy contributions and to find a market. The harbors named in this bill are all national, and their improvement is a matter of national concern. I therefore, in behalf of the committee, invoke the common voice of this House in favor of this legislation. There is no party question involved in it; but in giving to it our support we both provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear the amendment. Mr. ROSS. I desire to move to amend by inserting at the end of line eighty-eight, page 5, the following:

That $200,000 be appropriated for the improvement of the Illinois river.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield to allow that amendment to be offered. As gentlemen around me are pressing me to permit amendments, I ought to say that the bill contains no appropriation which does not rest upon careful estimates made at the War Department and upon recommendations which have emanated from there. I want to say, further, that there is not one point concerning which petitions have come from the people, so that the Committee on Commerce has had jurisdiction of the question, which has not been carefully examined; and I believe that in every instance where the people have desired the action of Congress, and where it has been possible to obtain from the Department such estimates as would enable the committee to determine with any accuracy what was wanted, appropriations have been reported. But it would not do to open the bill to amendments which are loose in their form and founded on mere guess-work.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for an amendment which I can explain in a few words, and which I think will not be objectionable to the gentleman.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear the amendment.

Mr. DONNELLY. I propose to add after the word "Maine" in the sixteenth line of the fourth section the following:

"At the Zumbro river, Minnesota, at the Cannon river, Minnesota."

Mr. Speaker, these rivers penetrate into one of the richest agricultural regions of my district; regions overflowing annually with great crops of grain and whose importance is annually increasing. The Zumbro river can be, I am assured, made navigable for steamboats for forty miles from where it enters the Mississippi river; and thus develop immensely the country for a space of twenty miles around it, while it will have a beneficial effect upon the growth of the entire region in which it is situated, and the towns upon the Mississippi to which it is tributary.

The Cannon river can be greatly improved, and it is the belief of many in my State that a system of water communication can be created, reaching, by canal, from the mouth of the Cannon river through streams and water-courses to the Minnesota river. It will be for the officers who make the survey to determine how far so great an enterprise would be practicable at this time, or if not, how much of it shall now be attempted. Of one thing we can be assured, that such a work would have the most enormous and instantaneous effect in settling and developing all that rich region of country, second to none in the United States in fertility and intrinsic value.

The Legislature of my State has memorialized for both these improvements, and has asked for land grants to aid them. I prefer that an appropriation should be made in money; and as it is evident by the appropriations already made by this bill that it is the intention of Congress to make liberal advances for the development and improvement of rivers and harbors, I can see no reason why the young and rapidly growing State of Minnesota should not participate in the largesses of the Government; and as I cannot ask for definite appropriations without a previous survey and examination to ascertain the amount requisite, I therefore offer these amendments to the bill, so that these rivers can be examined and we may know distinctly, when the next session of Congress convenes, just what amount of appropriation will be necessary.

The bill also contains a provision for a similar survey of the Mississippi river between Fort Snelling and the falls of St. Anthony. The importance of the work contemplated in such a survey cannot be overestimated. It would carry the navigation of the Mississippi river up to the foot of the great falls of St. Anthony and make continuous navigation in an almost direct line north and south from that point to the Gulf of Mexico. The head of such a mighty valley cannot be unimportant. Around it are already clustering great cities—St. Paul, the capital and commercial center of the State, and the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Anthony, possessed of the greatest manufacturing facilities to be found in the entire Mississippi valley; and where already the hum of woolen and cotton mills is heard, with the clatter of innumerable lumber mills. From these three great cities, now growing rapidly, and yet to spread over the intervening country until their expanding populations mingle and merge in one great metropolis, shall descend to the tropical valley far below them, there teeming with a crowded, happy, and free population, all the great productions of the temperate regions, lumber and wool, wheat and cattle, the productions of the field and the manufactured goods of the mill.

It is right and just that the navigation of the great river should reach to the very foot of the falls and receive the cargoes of its floating palaces from the very doors of its factories; and I trust the time is not far distant when even above the falls the Government can be induced to make an appropriation sufficient to deepen and improve the river up to the falls above St. Cloud. We owe it to the West that, where nature has done so much toward the construction of a mighty highway, no niggardly policy should govern us in relieving it of any partial impediments to navigation.

Mr. ELIOT. As this amendment proposes simply a survey, without any additional appropriation I do not object. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] has an amendment of a similar character, which I am willing shall be adopted.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. My amendment is to add, "of the harbor and the mouth of the Eighteen Mile creek, at Olcott, New York."

Mr. PIKE. I desire to offer an amendment of the same character. It is to insert, "of the St. Croix river above the Ledge."

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to move an amendment of the same nature, to add, "from the mouth of the Illinois river to La Salle."

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. These different propositions will be considered as one amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "Maine," in the sixteenth line of the fourth section, the following:

At Zumbro river, Minnesota; at Cannon river, Minnesota; of the harbor and the mouth of the Eighteen Mile creek, at Olcott, New York; of the St. Croix river above the Ledge; from the mouth of Illinois river to La Salle.

Mr. ELIOT. I now call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to give way that I may offer a proviso which will not interfere with these appropriations. I propose to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall at all times be authorized to place the public works of the United States mentioned in this act in charge of custom-house officers or other agents of the Government living near to said works respectively, who shall protect the same from unwarrantable obstructions or injuries of any kind, without additional charge for their services.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot possibly yield for that amendment. It proposes wholly new legislation.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELIOT demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL FRY—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask to send to the Clerk's table to have read the letter the reading of which was objected to this morning.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object, but only ask, if the matter relates to me, to have opportunity to reply.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to repeat what I said before.

Mr. ROSS. I object to the gentleman from New York making a speech.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman does not want a letter to be read relating to a member and then not permit that member to reply.

Mr. ROSS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I want this letter read for the double purpose of vindicating myself from the charge of having made an untruthful statement on this floor, and to give, in the broad American sense, fair play and opportunity to a worthy officer to be heard in a forum where he has been assailed.

I wish further to say that if, on investigation, I had found I was in error in the statement I had made touching the member from the Utica district of New York [Mr. CONKLING] and Provost Marshal General Fry, I would, mortifying as it would have been, apologized to the House. Whether I was in error or not I leave to those who hear the letter of the Provost Marshal General.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
WASHINGTON, April 27, 1866.

SIR: I have to thank you for repelling as you did, in the House of Representatives, on the 25th instant, the very extraordinary assault upon me by Hon. Roscoe Conkling, of New York. It was a defense of me in a forum where I had no opportunity to be personally heard, and I am enabled to say that your assertions touching Mr. Conkling's difficulties with this bureau are amply and completely justified by the facts which this letter will disclose.

My official intercourse with Representatives in Congress during the past three years has been constant and in many cases intimate, and, with the solitary exception of Mr. Conkling, it has been marked, so far as I remember, by mutual honor and fair dealing. Mr. Conkling being thus an exception, it is my purpose to give a brief summary of his connection and intercourse with this bureau.

In the summer of 1863 Mr. Conkling made a case for himself by telegraphing to the War Department that the provost marshal of his district required legal advice, which he was thereupon empowered to give.

In April, 1865, Mr. Charles A. Dana, then Assistant Secretary of War, without notifying me, had Mr. Conkling appointed to investigate all frauds in enlistments in western New York, with the stipulation that he should be commissioned judge advocate for the prosecution of any cases brought to trial, and he was so appointed to prosecute, before a general court-martial, Major J. A. Hadlock. Mr. Dana vested him, by several orders issued in the name of the Secretary of War, without the sanction of Mr. Stanton, with the most extraordinary powers. Among these was the right to examine the dispatches in all telegraph offices in the western division of New York, which enabled a violation of the sanctity of personal and business correspondence. For his services in this connection Mr. Conkling received, on the 9th of November last, from the United States the modest fee of $3,000. Whether he received, as it has been reported, from his district $5,000 more for the same service, and whether he received additional fees from guilty parties for opposing proceedings at Utica, I am unable now to say, but, as hereafter shown, he was as zealous in preventing prosecutions at Utica as he was in making them at Elmira; and the main ground of difficulty between Mr. Conkling and myself has been that I wanted exposure at both places while he wanted concealment at one. I suppose there can be no doubt among high-minded men as to the character of Mr. Conkling's course in this matter. Whether his action in exercising the functions of judge advocate and receiving pay therefor from the United States to the amount of $3,000 while receiving his compensation as a member of Congress was a violation of the letter or spirit, or both, of article one, section two, of the Constitution, I leave others to decide.

As to the animus of Mr. Conkling's calumnious assault upon me, it is true (notwithstanding his assertion that he had no personal quarrels with me) that the differences between him and myself arose altogether from my unwillingness to gratify him in certain matters in which he had a strong personal interest. It is true, also, that he was foiled in his efforts to obtain undue concessions from my bureau, and to discredit me in the eyes of my superiors.

There have been three main issues between Mr. Conkling and myself.

The first arose in consequence of the removal of Captain Richardson, (the first provost marshal of Mr. Conkling's district,) upon a report of Judge Advocate Turner, that the proofs in his case disclosed a reckless persistence in fraudulent practices. Mr. Conkling complained of my action both to the President and War Department, but failed to procure any modification of my course.

The second issue was as to the restoring of Captain Crandall, (the second provost marshal of the district,) after I had secured his removal from duty on the recommendation of Major Ludington, who thoroughly inspected the district and reported that though not legally guilty he had morally perpetrated a most glaring and inexcusable fraud on the Government; he was sworn to serve, and that he had quieted his conscience by casuistry and regulated his actions by the counsel of unscrupulous legal advisers. Mr. Conkling failed to get Captain Crandall restored, and the officer selected by me continued in charge of the business until the office was closed.

The third issue was as to the Government's employing counsel to defend Captain Crandall after he had been relieved and had carried with him, in violation of the orders of the Department, some twenty thousand dollars, local bounty deposited with him in behalf of recruits, and in regard to which he got into litigation. In this Mr. Conkling failed. Counsel has not, to my knowledge, been authorized, nor have any lawyers been paid by the Government in that suit.

In support of his denial of differences with me which influenced his action Mr. Conkling states the fact that we had but one personal interview. That is true, but it proves the reverse of what Mr. Conkling asserts, for it was of such a nature as to render other interviews very objectionable. I was called to Mr. Dana's office to have a verbal discussion with Mr. Conkling on the questions at issue, but I had by this time learned too much of this gentleman to transact business with him in that way, and I declined to do so. We had, directly and indirectly, much correspondence, and generally of an unpleasant character, and I presume under such circumstances it will be granted that men's personal relations will be bad although they may have had but one personal interview.

Notwithstanding Mr. Conkling's denial in the House, his own letters as well as the foregoing statements show that there were differences and that he was "worsted." On the 25th of October, 1865, I wrote the Secretary of War, saying: "It is now many months since I have been able to obtain any response from the Department touching the interests of the Government in this District. Still I venture one more trial," &c.

Mr. Conkling asserts and presents it as an offense or crime on my part that Major Haddock was my cronny, confidant, &c., and that I justified him (Haddock) down to the time when his sentence was published and afterward.

These assertions are not true. Major Haddock was never my confidant or cronny. Prior to his entry into the Veteran Reserve corps I had never heard of him. He was appointed to that corps by a special order from the Secretary of War, without any knowledge or action on my part. He served under General Onkes, in Illinois, by whom he was highly recommended to me.

He then served for a short time in a subordinate position in a branch of my office, without my becoming intimate with him, personally or officially. He has never made a social or personal call on me in his life. He was highly recommended by the officer under whom he served in my office, and was selected for a temporary provost marshalship in Pennsylvania, where he rendered efficient service, without his integrity or capacity being questioned. After serving for a short time with fidelity, so far as I know, as acting provost marshal at Buffalo, he was selected as acting assistant provost marshal general, at Elmira, for the reason, and that only, that I thought he was upright and suited to the position. In that position I befriended and sustained him until I had proper evidence of his being unworthy, and not a day longer; but on this point I required better testimony than Hon. Roscoe Conkling. I received a letter dated as late as March 29, 1865, from Hon. Hamilton Ward, member of Congress of the district in which Major Haddock was stationed, claiming to be familiar with Haddock's course and the motives of the persons operating against him, "and protesting against his removal," but notwithstanding this, as soon as the official report against him was received, on the 1st of April, I had him relieved and his conduct put under investigation. He had not then been four months on duty as acting assistant provost marshal general.

After his trial and dismissal Major Haddock came to Washington to get a revocation or modification of his sentence. He pointed out to me instances of unfairness in his trial, but I declined to do anything in aid of his object, as I thought he deserved punishment, not for all the crimes with which Mr. Conkling charged him, but for the offenses of which he was really guilty. I even refused to give him a letter as to his behavior prior to his being accused, because I knew that such a letter, though perhaps not wrong in itself, would be used to accomplish a purpose which I did not approve, namely, his pardon.

Major Haddock went on duty at Elmira as acting assistant provost marshal general, December 9, 1864.

An inspection made at my request the latter part of March, 1865, elicited the first information which I received suitable for proceeding against him.

I received the report on the 1st of April, and on the same day I submitted it to the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that Major Haddock be relieved from duty as acting assistant provost marshal general of western New York, and that his conduct be further investigated, which was approved by the Secretary of War, and Major Haddock was promptly relieved.

The prosecution of Major Haddock was on April 3, 1865, made the special business of Mr. Conkling and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, as shown by a letter from Mr. Charles A. Dana, Assistant Secretary of War. But whenever I had an opportunity, and so far as I had power, I urged forward the trial of Major Haddock. I was told by Mr. Dana, early in April, that Mr. Conkling would prepare charges, but hearing nothing definite in regard to them I, on the 22d of April, 1865, wrote to Mr. Conkling asking when he would be ready to proceed with the trial, to which I received a reply saying that he had forwarded the charges to the Secretary of War. This letter I at once (May 1st) referred to the Judge Advocate General, with the request that the trial might take place as soon as possible. The court was ordered to convene on the 17th of May, 1865. Notwithstanding Mr. Conkling was directed to get his instructions from General Holt, he frequently applied to me. On the 15th of May I referred a letter from him of the 13th with the following indorsement: "Respectfully referred to the Judge Advocate General, with the request that he will answer Mr. Conkling's inquiries by telegraph to-day, as the court meets day after tomorrow. Mr. Conkling is judge advocate of the court, and I recommend that all proper authority and facilities be granted to him at once." When the organization of the court was delayed by the absence of members I secured at once the detail of other officers, and notified Mr. Conkling by telegraph. There are other facts bearing on this point, but the foregoing are, I think, sufficient to show my desire to have Major Haddock tried.

Mr. Conkling, in his speech, insinuates dishonesty, saying this bureau should "allow the War Department and the country to know precisely what has become of the twenty-five million and odd dollars which, under the act of March 3, 1863, went to its credit." My official report, now partly in the hands of the Public Printer, shows in detail the disposition of every dollar of this money, and shows, moreover, a completeness and accuracy in accounts that is not surpassed, if it is equalled, by any bureau under the Government, and I hold a certificate from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury that all my accounts relating to this fund have been examined and found correct. Mr. Conkling speaks of this bureau allowing the War Department to know, &c., as if they were separate branches of the Government. My bureau is a subordinate branch of the War Department, and I wish here to point out clearly the fact that my business has been conducted under the constant supervision and direction of the Secretary of War, and those authorized to act in his name. It ought not to be necessary for me to remind either Mr. Conkling or the "people" that Mr. Stanton has never been unwilling to make examinations into the conduct of his subordinates, nor slow to act upon the result of them. This of itself is a sufficient reply to Mr. Conkling's abuse of me, especially as it is a fact that every request, complaint, or accusation of any importance made by him to or affecting this bureau, has been laid before the Secretary of War, and passed upon by him. It is true that the result has in nearly every instance been unfavorable to Mr. Conkling; and assuming that these were the differences or quarrels which were referred to in the debate as those in which Mr. Conkling came out "second best," he asserted what was not true when he denied them.

Mr. Conkling says that he may hereafter inform Congress what number of all the men who received bounty reached the front, intimating that the proportion was small. - I, for one, should be glad to obtain that information. The duty of sending men to the front rested with the Adjutant General of the Army and not with me.

He also hints that he may hereafter make a damaging exposure of the operations of my bureau. Whatever he may adduce in this connection he will probably not be able to disprove that it raised more than a million men for the Army, which, when hostilities ceased, consisted, notwithstanding all the losses, of one million five hundred and sixteen men; that it arrested and returned to the service over seventy-six thousand deserters, and that it raised by its own operations, in conformity to law, over twenty-six million dollars, which sum has been properly disposed of.

That there were frauds in my branch of the service I admit, but that they prevailed to a greater degree in it than in others, or that earnest and zealous efforts were not made by me to pursue, correct, and punish them, no man dare have the hardihood to assert.

And I will here state that the fraud or loss in Government funds under my bureau, including both that punished and that unpunished, has been comparatively small.

The frauds and malpractices which did occur were almost entirely in connection with local bounties, which could not be controlled by the United States, and which corrupted some of the officers of this bureau, but more of the people at large, including supervisors, agents, &c., selected by the people to disburse the funds which they so lavishly bestowed.

The general management of my business has received the approval of all dispassionate parties who have had an opportunity to judge of it, including the late President and that superior officer to whom I have been directly responsible, whose vigor and whose capacity and opportunity to judge are beyond dispute; and it will not be forgotten that complaints and accusations have been spread with great industry before the high officials last referred to.

I have been at all times amenable to the severest form of law—the military code—liable at any moment to summary arrest, court-martial, and extreme punishment in case of any dereliction of official duty. No one knew or knows this fact better than Mr. Conkling, and if, while acting as judge advocate, under the extraordinary inquisitorial powers bestowed upon him by his friend Mr. Dana, he came into the possession of any fact impugning or impeaching my integrity as a public officer, he was guilty of grave public wrong and unfaithfulness if he did not instantly file formal charges against me with the Secretary of War. He can, therefore, only escape the charge of deliberate and malignant falsehood as a member of Congress by confessing an unpardonable breach of duty as judge advocate. He held both offices and took pay for both at the same time; he has certainly been false to honor in one, and perhaps, as the sequel may show, in both.

Copies of official documents substantiating statements herein made are subjoined.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES B. FRY,

Provost Marshal General.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not ask the accompanying documents shall be read. I only ask that the letter and documents be printed.

Mr. ROSS. I move that ten thousand extra copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that everything be read. I enjoy it very much.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

SIR: I am instructed by the Secretary of War to authorize you to investigate all cases of fraud in the provost marshal's department of the western division of New York, and all misdemeanors connected with recruiting. You will from time to time make report to this Department of the progress of your labors, and will apply for any special authority for which you may have occasion. The Judge Advocate General will be instructed to issue to you an appointment as special judge advocate, for the prosecution of any cases that may be brought to trial before a military tribunal. You will also appear in behalf of this Department in any case that it may be deemed more expedient to bring before the civil tribunals.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. A. DANA,

Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

Hon. Roscoe Conkling having been appointed by the Secretary of War, to investigate transactions connected with recruiting in the western division of New York, all telegraph companies and operators are respectfully requested to afford him access to any dispatches which he may require for the purpose of detecting frauds and bringing criminals to trial.

By order of the Secretary of War:
C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

Hon. Roscoe Conkling having been appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate transactions connected with recruiting in the western division of New York, all provost marshals and other military officers are hereby directed to give him free access to all their official records and correspondence, and to furnish him certified copies of any papers that he may require.

By order of the Secretary of War:
C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, December 21, 1864.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return to you the papers in the case of Captain Richardson, provost marshal twenty-first district New York, and respectfully recommend that said Richardson be at once arrested and held in custody for trial by court-martial. The proofs in this case disclose a reckless persistence in fraudulent practices that not only demand his arrest and trial, but also a complete renovation in the office of said district.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. C. TURNER,

Judge Advocate.

Brigadier General JAMES B. FRY,

Provost Marshal General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1865.

SIR: In obedience to paragraph seventy-eight, Special Orders No. 130, Adjutant General's Office, current series, and to your verbal instructions, I made an inspection of the board of enrollment for the twenty-first district, State of New York, and have the honor to report as follows:

The prominent men of that district, the supervisors of its various towns and people, generally united in a determination to fill its quota under last call without sending citizens of the district. To this end a bounty of $725 was provided for every recruit, and each supervisor was authorized to procure men. If recruits could be had for less than the above-mentioned sum, the difference accrued to the supervisor. The board of supervisors thus became a board of bounty brokers. Contracts were made with a notorious bounty broker, Aaron Richardson, for a supply of men.

This machinery for filling the quota being properly constructed with great consideration for the district, and regardless of the rights of the Government, there was found only one difficulty in its practical operation.

An order from the acting assistant provost marshal general of the western division of New York required a deposit with officers of the United States of five eighths of the bounty paid recruits. This was objectionable to the class of men furnished by the supervisors and Contractor Richardson, who very greatly preferred taking care of their own funds; and therefore recruiting did not progress rapidly. Some ingenious men of the district devised a cunning scheme to obviate this difficulty. Each recruit was instructed to say to the provost marshal that he desired no local bounty; that he went from better motives, and that Government provided as large bounty as he cared to accept.

The provost marshal admired the disinterestedness of the recruit and mustered him in. Men were now obtained rapidly. Bounty jumpers came to Utica by ear-loads, and, to use their own slang, the enrolling board of the twenty-first district became "a perfect walk." These facts are notorious throughout the western division of New York, and are amply proven by papers referred to me from Provost Marshal General's Office and herewith returned.

During the administration of Captain Crandall, provost marshal twenty-first district, from 24th January to 14th March, 1865, the records of his office show that there were enlisted forty-one men who refused all bounty, two hundred and sixty-nine who accepted fifty dollars, thirty-five who accepted from one hundred to two hundred dollars, and one hundred and twenty-three who received more than three hundred dollars.

In all, four hundred and sixty-eight were mustered in by Captain Crandall, of whom Major Haddock, acting assistant provost marshal general, western division New York, reports that fifty-five per cent. deserted before starting to the field. Had Captain Crandall retained in his hands five eighths of the bounty received by the two hundred and fifty deserters, there would have accrued to the Government $109,000. The amount paid over by him was very small, but I was unable to ascertain it exactly.

Upon the 13th March the enrolling board of this district was suspended and Major Beadle, third regiment Veteran Reserve corps, relieved Captain Crandall. Major Beadle states that he found the affairs of the office in confusion. His statement is appended, marked "Exhibit A."

Captain Crandall admitted that he had in possession $23,783 belonging to recruits and bounty brokers, but refused to turn it over for reasons given in his communication to Provost Marshal General, dated 11th March, 1865, herewith returned.

It is proper to state, in relation to the violation of Major Haddock's order to retain five eighths of recruits' bounty, that in the first seventeen cases, Captain Crandall explained why he did it, and Major Haddock was satisfied with the explanation. Upon this Captain Crandall based his subsequent action. The correspondence is annexed, marked "Exhibit B."

Aside from this transparent scheme to defraud the Government by filling the quota of their district with credits instead of men, there is nothing objectionable in the official conduct of the board. Some communications upon file in the Provost Marshal General's Office allege that the surgeon passed unfit men. But I am disposed to regard these cases as incident to haste and overwork, and not as showing criminality upon the surgeon's part.

The character of the surgeon (Babeok) has been above reproach, as also that of Captain Crandall. Commissioner Munroe has not enjoyed so fully the confidence of his fellow-citizens.

I do not regard the conduct of the board as legally guilty, but morally they have perpetrated a most glaring and inexcusable fraud upon the Government they were sworn to serve. They quieted their consciences by casuistry, and regulated their actions by the counsel of unscrupulous legal advisers. Mistled by sophistry, by an undue desire to serve well their friends, and by constant pressure from cowardly neighbors dreading a draft, they did this great wrong to their country, disgraced themselves, and brought upon their district a wide-spread reputation for rascality.

I respectfully recommend that every member of the board of enrollment for the twenty-first district of New York be dismissed the service, and that the money in possession of Captain Crandall be seized. And because of the disgraceful prejudice existing among the demoralized people of that district against filling their quota with decent men, thus preventing one of their own citizens from doing his duty to his country as well as his county, that an officer of the Army be detailed as provost marshal of that district. I have the honor to report further, that incident to the inspection of the twenty-first district facts in relation to the administration of Major John A. Haddock, acting assistant provost marshal general for western division of New York, were educed which led me to the conviction that he is unfit for the position he holds.

Men of undoubted character charge him with being insolent and abusive in discharging his duties, and grossly immoral; that he is in collusion with bounty brokers, and prostitutes his official position to personal ends. For proof of these charges I refer, at Utica, to the postmaster and Hon. R. Conkling; at Elmira, to the mayor, J. I. Nix, Postmaster D. F. Pickering, Provost Marshal J. S. Wright, Colonel B. F. Tracy, commanding post; Captain Eugene Devin, and Peter A. La France; also to Colonel L. C. Baker.

Very respectfully submitted,

E. H. LUDINGTON,
Major, Assistant Inspector General.

Brevet Brigadier General J. A. HARDIE,
Inspector General United States Army.

Respectfully referred to the Provost Marshal General.
JAMES A. HARDIE,
Inspector General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 1, 1865.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 1, 1865.

Respectfully submitted to the honorable Secretary of War:

1. I recommend that Major J. A. Haddock be relieved from duty as acting assistant provost marshal general of western division of New York, and that his conduct be further investigated, and that Major S. B. Hayman, United States Army, be detailed for that post. Major Hayman is on duty in Indiana and can be spared for the purpose.

2. That the appointments of the members of the board of enrollment in the twenty-first district of New York be revoked.

JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Presented to Secretary of War April 1, 1865, and approved by him.

JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

HEADQUARTERS DRAFT RENDEZVOUS,
ELMIRA, NEW YORK, February 20, 1865.

MAJOR: The twenty-first district, New York, is evading General Order 305. Men from that district bring with them to general rendezvous from twenty to twenty-two dollars each. The supervisors have taken some action with a view to evade the order. The district is filling its quota with bounty jumpers. Fifteen deserters from Auburn in one squad.

This is giving to this district an undue advantage over the other districts. There is now a rush of bounty jumpers for Utica. Major Haddock, acting assistant provost marshal general, declares himself powerless to correct this evil. I inclose telegrams from him to provost marshal at Utica, which show his views of the subject. General Order No. 305 is worthless and should be revoked unless the recruits are required to bring their money to general rendezvous. Unless this is stopped at once other districts will be compelled, in self-defense, to resort to the same dodge, and one of the best orders ever issued become a nullity.

I suggest that commanding officers of rendezvous be instructed to refuse to receipt for any recruit and substitute from this district unless he brings with him his local bounty or the amount paid him for becoming a substitute.

I am, Major, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

B. F. TRACY,
Colonel 127th U. S. C. T., Commanding Rendezvous.

Major H. CLAY WOOD,
Assistant Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP SEWARD,
AUBURN, NEW YORK, March 4, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you the following items in regard to the provost marshal's office at Utica. I learned from two apparently reputable men from Utica that the business at that office is conducted in the following manner: the supervisors of the county met and resolved to pay a county bounty of $600; they met again and resolved to add $125 to the $600, making $725 local bounty to be paid by the county; they then resolved themselves into a recruiting committee to furnish the quota of the county; they got the men at as low a figure as they can and charge the county the full amount of $725. The provost marshal and the examining surgeon seem to be but the creatures of these supervisors. Men rotten with venereal disease, totally unfit for any duty, are passed by the surgeon and sent here for duty. One old man, just discharged for disability, having the piles badly, before he got to his home was grabbed by these Utica harpies, put through by the officials, with, as he alleges, but $190, somebody pocketing the balance, and sent here. He is utterly worthless as a soldier. Nine tenths of the recruits sent here from that office are the most worthless set of scoundrels you ever put your eyes upon.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES L. LOTT.

First Lieutenant 19th V. R. C., Commanding Camp.
Major JOHN A. HADDOCK, Acting Assistant Provost Marshal General, Western Division New York.

HEADQUARTERS
192D REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS,
ALBANY, February 4, 1865.

COLONEL: I have the honor most respectfully to protest against the reception of recruits for the one hundred and ninety-second regiment New York volunteers who are mustered by the provost marshal at Utica. The men who have been received at the Veteran Reserve corps barracks from that city are, without doubt, "bounty jumpers," and should not have been mustered by any intelligent mustering officer. Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

N. G. AXTELL,

Colonel 192d Regiment New York Volunteers.

Lieutenant Colonel F. TOWNSEND,
Superintendent Recruiting Service.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 6, 1865.

SIR: The instructions of this bureau required provost marshals to turn over to the nearest disbursing officer all funds which came into their hands. The bureau having been informed that P. B. Crandall, then provost marshal of the Utica district, New York, had in his possession a large amount of money and bonds, and that he had not turned over the same or reported the fact to this office, he was ordered on the 4th of March, 1865, to turn over the money, which he refused to do.

On the 10th of the same month the order was repeated, and again disobeyed, he stating as a reason that he had been advised by counsel of high standing that he would be held personally responsible for the money.

On the following day the order was repeated, and again disobeyed with the statement that Ward Hunt, Esq., his counsel, advised him that he could not safely comply with the order.

On the 30th of March he was again ordered by telegraph from this office to turn over the money at once, and on the 1st day of April following, he answered by telegraph that he would immediately comply.

It subsequently appeared that instead of turning over the whole amount, $33,995 10, which he had previously stated was in his possession, he had only turned over $8,085.

On the 6th day of April his attention was called to that fact.

To this reply, dated April 13, was received on the 21st day of April, in which I was informed that the bonds in question ($20,000) had been seized by a writ of replevin at the suit of Richardson, and in which letter Captain Crandall stated as follows:

"I respectfully request the Government to take charge of the suit and relieve me from responsibility in regard to it. In the event, however, that no charge is taken of it by the Government, I have placed it under the direction of Messrs. Hunt, Waterman & Hunt, who will appear as my attorneys in the case."

On the 9th day of March, 1865, Captain Crandall was suspended from office, and on the 31st of May, 1865, his services as provost marshal were discontinued.

No further information on the subject of the $20,000 in county bonds was received from Captain Crandall until the letter dated September 15, a copy of which is transmitted by Hon. Roscoe Conkling. I have never approved of Captain Crandall's course in relation to turning in these moneys, nor of the intercourse between him and Aaron Richardson, the bounty broker, by which he, Crandall, came in possession of $20,000 county bonds, now under discussion. Having, however, taken these bonds, Captain Crandall was ordered to turn them over to a designated disbursing officer of the Government, which he refused to do.

This refusal resulted in his suspension from duty, a correspondence, and a renewal of the orders to turn in the money, in answer to which renewed orders the fact appeared that during the correspondence and delay occasioned by Captain Crandall's disobedience, the money was taken out of his hands by a writ of replevin at the suit of Aaron Richardson, the bounty broker. It will be observed that in his first report of April 13 on the subject, Captain Crandall asks the Government to take charge of the suit and relieve him from the responsibility in regard to it, but says "in the event, however, that no charge is taken of it by the Government, I have placed it under the direction of Messrs. Hunt, Waterman & Hunt, who will appear as my counsel."

When I received this letter, I did not think, and do not now, that the Government was called upon to relieve him from the responsibility in this matter, and as he contemplated and had provided for the contingency of the Government not assuming the suit, and had employed counsel, and placed it under their direction, no action from this office was necessary, and I therefore took none.

In his letter of September 15, renewing the subject, he says, "Unless the Department, therefore, gives instructions to the attorney for the defense, Hunt, Waterman & Hunt, Utica, New York, and assume the responsibility of the suit, the defense will be abandoned by me, and Mr. Richardson will be allowed to take a judgment for the recovery of his bonds and to obtain the possession of the same."

I did not then, and do not now, consider that the threat to abandon the suit, contained in this quotation, called for any action from this office. Mr. Crandall saw fit as a Government officer to receive these bonds from a bounty broker; he refused to obey the orders of this bureau as to the disposition of them, and permitted them to pass out of his hands, and become the subject of a civil suit; he assumed the suit and employed counsel to conduct it, the same counsel, it may be remarked, under whose advice he had refused to obey the orders of this bureau to turn in the funds. He now (assuming that the within letter speaks for him) again asks the Government to assume the suit, that is, pay the lawyer's bills, Mr. Crandall having employed the lawyers and placed the case under their direction. I do not advise this course; on the contrary, I recommend that the responsibility which Mr. Crandall assumed in this matter rest with him. If he adopts the course proposed in his letter of September 15, to abandon the suit and let Richardson have the bonds, it will not, I presume, invalidate the right to proceed against him for the amount if the Government has any good claim to it. I do not deem the insinuation made in the letter of Mr. Conkling, that an opportunity is sought to affront or punish the Union people of his district, worthy of denial or comment.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Before the Clerk had concluded the reading of the above documents,

Mr. BINGHAM asked whether the further reading of the documents could not be dispensed with.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wonder at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, but the gentleman will see there is a good deal of this is personal me, and whatever there is of that sort I want to hear. I do not want to burden the House.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose the entire matter read there is official, and consists of communications between that Department and the gentleman from New York, with which he is familiar. It can be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I will not trespass upon the attention of the House to have it read. It is all new to me, and gentlemen will appreciate my desire in having it read.

The SPEAKER. The reading will soon be finished.

The paper was then read through.

Mr. CONKLING. I appreciate the indifference with which the House must listen to an issue such as this, in its design on one side so personal and individual in its character; and at this hour of the day I shall not presume so far upon the good nature or the sense of justice of my fellow-members as to ask them for any great length of time to hear an explanation or a statement the main object of which must seem to be to repel a purely personal attack. I can, however, assure the House with the utmost sincerity that for everything in this most extraordinary communication saving of imputation upon me I am consoled, ay, doubly consoled, by the fact that I shall become the humble instrument of initiating an investigation much needed and good for the people of the whole country, wholesome and cleansing to the future.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I shall yield to some gentleman to move, and I know the House will order it, a committee to investigate a subject which has now ceased to be individual and become public, a subject which concerns the rights and interests not only of that great procession of mourners and cripples which war has left in our land, not only of the tax-payers of the country, but also to those in every walk and avenue of life, because all have a deep interest in preserving the purity of the Government in all its departments.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I shall have no part in that committee. I shall not move it, as it would not be proper for me to move it, but a committee will, I trust, be appointed to bring fairly to the public knowledge some of the matters whereof I shall briefly speak.

Now, sir, asking the indulgence of the House for a space, I wish to take up some of the matters in this communication of General Fry as I was able to note them in the reading, which point directly, and which are intended to point injuriously to me.

Mr. Speaker, I did not file in the War Department long ago information in reference to widespread frauds in recruiting in the State of New York in which extensive combinations of active men were banded together in office and out; I did not act as counsel for the Government in unearthing and breaking up these combinations and exposing the actors; I did not devote upward of four months of patient labor in an attempt to arrest the enormous robberies and wrongs which prevailed in the State of New York, nor did I make an assault upon this bureau here, without counting the cost and knowing the consequences.

I was prepared for all the calumnies and all the responsibility that he must take who strikes at the thieves, marauders, and miscreants who have fattened upon the necessities and needs of their country. I knew the resources and the desperation of the men who have made wealth out of the public woe. I understood perfectly that I must be prepared for all corners of this description, and it was to this that I referred in the avowal of my readiness to maintain my allegations of wrong in the Provost Marshal Bureau at all times and places. I will not say "elsewhere," for fear of unsettling the nerves of some who hear me; but avoiding the expression "elsewhere," which is so dreadful, I say that I did not forget nor did I desire to avoid the responsibility of being asked to make good by proof the accusations I made; of course I expected, by dispatches to newspapers instigated by General Fry and his satellites, by every mode, secret and open, of influencing the public judgment, and diverting attention from the objects of accusation, to be vilified; and I hoped to be permitted, if not invited, to point out to some authority competent to receive and act upon it the evidence on which I relied. That opportunity will be afforded if a committee shall be raised; and now I wish to call attention to three or four things contained in the letter of General Fry, and I will not go further on this occasion.

It is stated by this officer, as the House has heard, that upon a certain occasion I telegraphed to the Secretary of War in the language of the communication, as I caught it, in order "to make a case for myself;" that is, to procure my own professional employment. It was said that my dispatch was to the effect that the provost marshal of my district wanted advice. Let me state that transaction, all of it being matter of record in the War Department, so that it can be unmistakably verified or challenged.

An alleged deserter was arrested by the provost marshal of my district without the process of any court. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out of the supreme court of the State of New York. Acting upon a decision which had been made years before in a western case, and an opinion, or rather a charge, given a grand jury by Mr. Justice Nelson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, the officer made a return, in substance, that although no process of law had been issued for the arrest, he, as a military officer of the United States, held his prisoner and refused to obey the mandate of the writ. An attachment was issued and we were on the point of collision between the civil and the military authorities. I telegraphed the Secretary of War nothing except the facts, and my recommendation that he should direct the officer what to do. There was need of this. It was in 1863; a time in the State of New York when my colleagues well remember that it would only have been necessary that a collision should have occurred between the civil authority of the State and the military authority of the nation upon the issue of the habeas corpus and the effect would have been like drawing a match in a magazine of powder.

The Secretary of War telegraphed that the provost marshal must hold his prisoner at all events. I do not now profess to give the precise language, but it was that he must hold him and stand by his position, and the dispatch requested me to appear as his counsel, to take an appeal, and to argue the question between the military authorities of the United States and the judicial authority of New York.

I did appear; I did argue the case, and although that is neither here nor there, the decision was reversed, and reversed by one of the purest patriots and one of the most honored judges that ever graced New York's bench, and the decision stands as a monument of learning raised at a most critical and disordered time.

An appeal was taken to the court in banc. And there again I was requested by the Secretary of War, and I think the Attorney General upon the application of the district attorney of the United States, to act as counsel, and I did so. The decision was not reversed, and it performed a very useful part at a very important juncture.

That, Mr. Speaker, was my connection with that transaction, and that was all of it; and upon this, an officer at the head of a bureau has dared to send here a letter on pretense of defending himself, containing a groundless libel deliberately written to stab the reputation of a Representative in retaliation for discharging his duty here.

I do not mean to be led into much zeal over the matter; but it is a bad plan for a man unjustly accused to resort to this sort of counter assault.

Again, this writer states that I was appointed, if I understand it aright, without the knowledge or assent of the Secretary of War, but by the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Dana, judge advocate for a certain purpose. Let me state briefly that transaction. During the period referred to, or before, detectives were sent by the War Department into the State of New York, to endeavor to ferret out, if possible, and put a stop to frauds in recruiting. These detectives, it seems, had been directed by the authorities to apply to me, among others, for advice and information as to persons in various localities whose statements could be relied on. They came, several of them, and repeatedly, to me. They came in the night as well as in the day, and communicated to me various fragments and bits of evidence which they collected, showing rather the extent of the evil, and the difficulty of getting at the bottom of it than anything else.

Weeks elapsed, and very little information was gathered, or, as they expressed it, although they could get moral evidence enough, they could get no legal evidence. At length I promised that when I should be relieved of engagements in the courts which were then pressing, I would investigate, as far as I could, various things which they and I suspected. I did so; and I sent to the War Department such information as I gathered, and some very pregnant disclosures which were made. Having done this, acting as a citizen, I supposed my connection with it was to cease. But afterward—I cannot state the date precisely; it was in April, a year ago—I received in the city of Syracuse, fifty-three miles from my home, while I was there professionally engaged, an urgent telegraph from the Secretary of War, asking me to come to Washington. As soon as I could release myself I took the cars, and, riding night and day, reached here in ignorance of the purpose for which I was summoned. Arriving here in the morning, I went to the War Department, and there had an interview with Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War. He explained his sending for me, and stated to me certain facts, and I stated to him other facts relative to the subject of frauds and maladministration; and he proposed that, as counsel for the Government, I should investigate and prosecute, until the enormities discovered should be ferreted out and the guilty convicted. I at first declined, for reasons connected with my other professional engagements, knowing that preparatory to leaving home for the present session of Congress I should need all my time and strength in my ordinary business.

In my place, I suggested to the Secretary a gentleman, whose name I need not mention here, but it is one of the best and purest names in the State of New York, a gentleman of very high standing at the bar, and whom I hoped might be able to give the matter his attention, and I advised that to him rather than to me the retainer should be given. The answer of the Secretary was in effect, no, I know you, and I want you to do this, believing you will do it with activity and vigor, or some like remark of confidence. I took some little time to consider it, debating with myself. Upon reflection, I assented, and the Secretary himself directed in person and in my presence to be drawn up and presented to me a retainer which I believe has been read among these papers. That, sir, was the origin of that engagement, and of that transaction. Yet, the author of the remarkable production on the table ventures to insinuate, if he does not state, that I sought this employment, and obtained it, not from the Secretary of War, but from Mr. Dana, and that without the authority or assent, and I think without the knowledge, of the Secretary. I went to my home, disregarding and neglecting, as some persons who now hear me know, professional employments vastly more profitable to me, and devoted more than four months of most untiring, faithful labor to this investigation. I threw up numerous other retainers and gave undivided attention to this. I gave to it an effort which, although anybody else might have made it, and which did me no credit in the world, I stop to say, brought into the Treasury of the United States several hundred thousand dollars, and checked a most heady tide of swindling.

The investigation led, among other things, to the trial of this assistant provost marshal general, of whom General Fry says so much, and yet so little; a trial which alone consumed about eight weeks, at places distant from my home. When at last it was over, I declined to go further, thinking my poor share had been done, and finding it destructive to my regular business to engage in trials so interminable and absorbing, and I made report to the War Department and to the district attorney of the United States of the results which had been reached.

Some time after this, I received as other acting counsel do, I believe, a suggestion that I should present my bill.

I made out and sent to the War Department an account of the precise sum I had actually advanced in money, as traveling and other necessary expenses, rendering the amount to a farthing, and I made out no other account and no other charge. But I stated to the Secretary that I preferred not to do so, but to leave him to fix the amount; that the service was unusual to me, and that he better than I could judge of its value. I declined to fix any charge, but left it to him to fix such sum, whatever it might be, as he deemed the service worth; this I deemed at least fair to the Government, more than fair, for had I wished extravagant pay I should have taken any other course.

In reply I received from the Secretary of War a letter, in which he stated his opinion, and his opinion as a lawyer and as Secretary of War is a tolerably good one. Perhaps it will not be considered a remark too much aside, considering the intimations we have heard, if I pause, and render to the Secretary of War my personal thanks, and my testimony to the thanks which I believe the nation owes him for the integrity, the courage, and the manhood which he has given at the expense of his health to the American people during the darkest passage in their life. The Secretary of War, in reply to my letter, wrote to me, saying that he deemed $3,000 a moderate sum for the labor which had been performed, and if that should be satisfactory to me, it would be very satisfactory to him. I returned an answer that it was entirely satisfactory, as I may say any other sum he might have fixed would have been, as I did not consider it an occasion out of which profit was to be made, or in which even such a charge might be made as any lawyer fit to conduct such a prosecution would have expected from a private client.

Mr. ROSS. If it will not discompose the gentleman too much, I would ask him to state whether that was during the time he was drawing pay as a member of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not quite understand the pertinence of the question of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.] But I will endeavor to enlighten him. He probably knows, for I presume that information has extended to him, that the term of members of Congress commences on the 4th of March. And as the retainer which I have spoken of was in April, which, I will inform the gentleman, is a month that comes after March in the calendar, he will very likely be able, by the rule of three, or by some other rule with which he is familiar, to cipher out whether I was a member of Congress at the time or not. I suppose the gentleman put his question all in the way of good nature; and I give my explanation to him in the same way.

I should be sorry to suppose that the member from Illinois, or any other member of this House—indeed, I should be sorry as an American to suppose that the standard of intelligence anywhere in the country is so low, that any human being, unless it be that distinguished mathematician and warrior, Provost Marshal General Fry, believes that there is the slightest impropriety in a man who is a member of Congress practicing his profession as counsel in courts, or accepting from the Government of the United States or from any other client a retainer for such professional services. It would be very extraordinary, indeed, if some distinguished gentlemen, whom I will not name, who have recently performed most conspicuous professional services for the Government while they were members of Congress, had subjected themselves to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois, or of anybody whatever, always excepting, of course, Provost Marshal General Fry.

So much for that part of this bundle of papers given to a pretended statement of the circumstance of my acting as counsel for the United States.

I come to the next point which occurs to me. There is a statement, if I apprehended it aright, that some effort was made by me to have "concealment"—I think that was the word—in regard to the twenty-first congressional district. That is mere assertion. No circumstances are stated upon which it could be founded, therefore I cannot dissect it, but I pronounce the statement utterly and absolutely groundless—nothing whatever of truth can be found in it. On the contrary, in the investigation which took place before the court-martial to which reference has been made, everything that could be investigated pertaining to the twenty-first congressional district was investigated. The matter of recruiting there was held up, that the light might shine through and through it; and nothing in that statement amazes me more than that the Provost Marshal General or anybody else should dare, even in so daring a document, to put on record an assertion so utterly baseless.

So far I have noticed only some of the more far-fetched libels in these papers. I come now to the question which was made by the member who causes this letter to be read, the pretense that it in some way bolstered up the assertions made by him the other day. This letter was read in part, we were told, to show that I was not warranted in pronouncing untrue the statement that I had had personal "quarrels" with the Provost Marshal General. I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to remind gentlemen of the precise statement which on that occasion I pronounced untrue. The member from Maine said—I read from the Globe—

"I do not suppose that the House of Representatives care anything more than the Committee on Military Affairs about the great recruiting frauds of New York or the quarrels of the gentleman from New York with General Fry, in which quarrels, it is generally understood, the gentleman came out second best at the War Department."

I will not stop to read further (although I propose to have all I have marked inserted in my remarks) the various forms in which the statement was made that I had had personal quarrels with Provost Marshal General Fry.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman will read the whole. If he will show me the word "personal" in the speech to which he is replying, I will reward him. He cannot do it. He is putting his own interpretation upon it. Let the gentleman read all that he is going to print.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I hope the active member from Maine will preserve himself as free from agitation as possible.

Mr. BLAINE. I demand that whatever the gentleman puts in the Globe he shall read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. CONKLING. I am not asked to yield. The Chair will see that all this interruption is in defiance of the proprieties of debate. I have no objection to the member from Maine being heard, however, at any length he pleases.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a point of order. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. My point of order is that the gentleman from New York has no right to insert in the Globe what is not read either by himself or by the Clerk. I object to his doing so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to object to its being printed in the Globe if it is not read.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, this is a little episode, I suppose, for the amusement and diversion of the House. It is quite unnecessary. The member had better be quiet; I am entirely disposed to have the whole passage read; and I will ask to have it read. I intended to send it to the Globe reporters for insertion. I suppose the member knew what had already been printed in the Globe as coming from him.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. For what purpose?

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he was drawing pay as judge advocate at the same time when he was receiving $3,000 a year from the Government as a member of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I will answer the gentleman's question, Mr. Speaker; and I ask the Clerk to suspend for one moment the reading till I do so, because nothing interests me in connection with this matter more than the laudable curiosity of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.]

I beg, Mr. Speaker, to assure the gentleman "confidentially," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would say, and I hope he will regard it as a confidential communication, that I never did receive salary as judge advocate during the period he refers to or during any other period; not one penny. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I found myself very unexpectedly elevated when I saw the announcement in some paper that this retainer which the Government had given me made me acting judge advocate for the purpose of trying a case. It was merely an employment as counsel; and the counsel fee which was paid is, I beg to assure the gentleman, the only compensation that I ever received for my services. I never received any pay as judge advocate during any period whatever.

I now ask the Clerk to read the remarks which I have sent to the desk; all that are marked. They are the remarks of the member from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that the House of Representatives care anything more than the Committee on Military Affairs about the great recruiting frauds in New York, or the quarrels of the gentleman from New York with General Fry, in which quarrels it is generally understood the gentleman came out second best at the War Department. I do not think that such questions ought to be obtruded here."

"Though the gentleman from New York has had some difference with General Fry, yet I take pleasure in saying that, as I believe, there is not in the American Army a more honorable and high-toned officer than General Fry. That officer, I doubt not, is ready to meet the gentleman from New York or anybody else in the proper forum. I must say that I do not think it is any very creditable proceeding for the gentleman from New York here in this place to traduce General Fry as a military officer when he has no opportunity to be heard. I do not consider such a proceeding the highest specimen of chivalry that could be exhibited."

"The gentleman from New York has had his issues with General Fry at the War Department. They have been adjudicated upon by the Secretary of War; and I leave it for the gentleman to say whether he came out first best. I do not know the particulars; the gentleman can inform the House. All I have to say is—and in this I believe I speak the sentiment of a majority of the members of this House—that James B. Fry is a most efficient officer, a high-toned gentleman, whose character is without spot or blemish; a gentleman who stands second to no officer in the American Army; and he is ready to meet the gentleman from New York and all other accusers anywhere and everywhere. And, sir, when I hear the gentleman from New York rehearse in this House, as an impeachment of General Fry, all the details of the recruiting frauds in New York, which General Fry used his best energies to repress with iron hand, a sense of indignation carries me beyond my personal strength and compels to denounce such a course of proceeding."

Mr. BLAINE. The word "personal" does not occur there.

Mr. CONKLING. The House will observe I did not say the word "personal" did occur. But that is not here nor there. All gentlemen, all who have the appreciation or instincts of gentlemen, see the point of this passage. It was the assertion that I had had "quarrels" with Provost Marshal Fry, repeating that word more than once, and using other forms of expression; and that I had had "quarrels" with General Fry in which "quarrels" I had been worsted, in which "quarrels" I had been put down by the Secretary of War; in which the Secretary of War had taken sides against me. These were the points, first: that there had occurred between General Fry and myself "quarrels," and second, that in those "quarrels" I had been worsted, and worsted by the Secretary of War.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is there any shadow or foundation for that? I mean, taking the communication of the Provost Marshal General as the only evidence upon the subject. What does he say? I had stated, as the House will remember, before the member from Maine injected his statement—I will read that—I had previously stated all about having been employed to prosecute General Fry's friend and assistant. I said:

"I was employed by the Government to prosecute some of the frauds to which I have referred; and I tried this assistant provost marshal general, who had been justified in all the outrages he committed, and in all the thefts by which millions were stolen from the people of New York; who was justified by his superior officer down to the time when the sentence was published, and afterward, I understand."

The member from Maine, then, did not mean this prosecution by his statement. Now, what does the Provost Marshal say to give color to the statement that, independent of this, anything had taken place which will help out the assertion of "quarrels," and that I was worsted? What does he state? That Captain Richardson, a provost marshal in my district, was removed. So he was. He was removed without notice and without charges. He was removed, as it turned out, on the report of Haddock and the accusation of a man who is himself to be tried in a few weeks for such frauds as he charged upon Captain Richardson. The facts were in part made known to me, and, in common with some of the first citizens of my district, I represented to the War Department and to the President, if that was the form of the petition, that this man had been removed without notice and on secret information. We thought he should be heard; that there should be an investigation in regard to it. That is the beginning and end of all I had to say or to do with the removal of Captain Joseph P. Richardson. I think it will be hardly said that was a quarrel with General Fry.

The next statement is that Captain Peter B. Crandall was appointed provost marshal of my district and was afterward removed. So he was, and I take occasion to say, in the face of the imputations put upon Captain Crandall by General Fry, if ever I looked into the face of an honest man, P. B. Crandall is honest. I take it upon myself to state that a more honest man never broke bread than this man who was trodden under foot by bounty jumpers and thieves because he would not submit to them in violation of his duty and of the law of the land. There is a place where Peter B. Crandall is known, where he has been long known; and fortunately for me, also, in that same place, the twenty-first district of New York, inhabited as it is by as brave, as generous, as patriotic people as were ever represented on this floor, I am known and have been known for twenty years.

The people with whom I live, among whom I expect to die, know better than General Fry can tell them, whether the man who dared to pen the libels we have heard read deserves to be sustained and commended, or whether he deserves to be gibbeted at the cross-roads of common contempt.

But, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that Peter B. Crandall was appointed provost marshal. He was appointed upon the recommendation of the most honored and trusted of our citizens without my having any part in his selection. I had no part or lot in it. It was made entirely by others. The person whom they selected was chosen because his integrity was and is beyond all question. He was removed after bounty brokers had threatened him that if he did not submit to their behests he would be removed, and after he had defied them to bring the machinery of this great Government to bear upon him for doing his duty. He was removed at the very time when they predicted his downfall, and I say here that he was removed because he did his duty and for no other reason under heaven, whether General Fry knows it or not. Had he been rascal enough to comply with illicit requests, he would never have been touched by the hands which struck him down.

I joined with various of the citizens of my district in representing to the Secretary of War that a mistake had been made or a wrong had been done in the case of this man; that if anybody was honest he was, and that it was doing great violence to the public service and to the people of that district to strike down a man who had been selected by some of its best citizens because he was in point of character above reproach.

That is all I had to do with it. I united with others in signing these representations. Was that having a personal quarrel with General Fry?

One thing more is referred to in connection with Captain Crandall. He had taken and held, and persevered in holding $20,000 of bonds which were claimed of him by a bounty broker. He said they belonged to the Government of the United States, because the man had deserted for whom these bonds were hypothecated, and he would never surrender them to the claimant until he was compelled to do it by law. He was sued, and I wrote several times to the War Department recommending the Secretary of War to look into the facts himself and see whether the bonds might not be held, as I thought they should be held, by the Government. This is all I had to do with that.

The cause was subsequently tried. I had nothing to do with it. The counsel was a gentleman whose name appears in the papers read, a citizen honored in every walk of life, and Captain Crandall was sustained in holding the bonds, the court deciding that he did what should have been done, and that he ought not to have delivered them up. That is the entire of that transaction.

Having disposed of these things which General Fry recounts, I ask the House to observe that in no aspect, by no stretch, do they show that I quarreled with General Fry; at most they only show that recommendations made by me to the War Department roused his hostility.

Having referred to all transactions connecting me with him to which he refers, I come now to the one single interview which he says took place between us. It was upon the occasion which I referred to when I came here in response to a telegram from the Secretary of War.

The Provost Marshal General was sent for to come into the room of the Assistant Secretary of War during that day to give information, and he did come, and informed me of various things, among others, that Major Haddock was an estimable and honorable man; he denied utterly that there was anything to be said against him, although he had then made the recommendation which he parades, and for which he takes credit now, that he should be suspended; that he was satisfied Haddock was honest, and would back him anywhere. He said further that the people of my district, all of them, as he understood it, were cowards, drunkards, and sneaks; that that was his information; that there was not, he believed, an honest man in that district, and if one could be found and set to discharging the duties of provost marshal, as soon as it was known by others, they would immediately debauch him.

I was somewhat astounded at language like this, but I had no quarrel with General Fry. I was taught somewhat early in life that while a man should be careful in his associations, he should be choice in his fighting; and having received my impression of this man then and previously, I chose to have no controversy with him. Nor does he pretend that I had any. I did not call upon him. I neither sought nor avoided him. I requested no interview with him. There was nothing of the interview except that he was sent for to give certain information. He gave his information, he made the remarks I stated, and some other remarks, and retired upon his laurels.

The fact, then, is precisely this: neither in conversation with General Fry did I ever have any quarrel with him, nor by letter or correspondence did I ever have any quarrels with him; and no way whatever have I ever had a quarrel, in any definition of that term, with this Provost Marshal General.

As I said the other day, I prosecuted his assistant and friend. I knew then that I incurred his ire in doing it. I recommended to the War Department from time to time such things as I deemed it my duty to recommend. This I well know angered him, but I believe I never had occasion to make to the Secretary of War a recommendation relative to matters coming before him, which was not promptly responded to, and promptly approved. Unless I have forgotten something, I believe that throughout this prosecution I never addressed to the Secretary of War a single recommendation in regard to it which he did not approve, and which did not meet with his sanction.

The House will see, therefore, with how much truth it was that a statement was made here, first that I had had quarrels with a man whom I never saw but once, and with whom I never quarreled at all; and in the second place, that in those quarrels I had been worsted, and worsted by the Secretary of War, worsted by that distinguished officer, whose friendship and confidence it has always been my privilege to enjoy, and who never on any occasion did toward me anything calculated to awaken any feelings but those of friendship and respect, and who has my thanks for many acts of courtesy and kindness.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have already gone far beyond my intention in rising, and I trust that those who have listened to me so attentively will pardon something to the extraordinary incident which has been witnessed, of the head of a bureau, a clerk in the War Department, sending here to be read such a pile of rubbish as that, a personal assault upon a member of this House, under the pretense of vindicating himself in some way or other.

This officer longs for vindication, not with regard to these insignificant matters which pertain to me personally, but he longs for vindication with regard to those public matters which concern him in his responsibility to the people of the country. And I beg now to say, that if a committee shall be raised by this House to investigate the doings of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, I will undertake to make good my assertion, that in the western division of New York, composing a large portion of that great State, this bureau, as it was administered, was one carnival of corrupt disorder. I will endeavor to make good that statement; and then the public shall know whether the head of the bureau was a man incapable of administration—a man incapable of seeing the difference between honest men and thieves—or whether it was administered by a man who had the capacity to do it, and who, but for the want of another quality, would have performed its duties well.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask my colleague from the St. Lawrence district, [Mr. HULBORN,] whose position in this House and in the country and in the State of New York will be a sufficient guarantee for the probity and the ability which will be brought to the service—I ask him to move that a committee be appointed by the House to investigate the doings of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, and let us see whether a man, however humble he may be, who rises here to denounce what he knows to be a public wrong, is to be shuffled off by newspaper effects, or effects to be produced by sending here to be read such a communication as lies before us. If this man and his trusted agents are innocent he and they should have a full and thorough investigation of all the practices of which they stand accused.

I now yield the floor to my colleague for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. HULBURD. I presume I shall meet the sense of the House when I say that it has probably devoted as much time as it ought to do to this matter between my colleague, the gentleman from Maine, and the Provost Marshal General. I propose to send to the Chair a resolution asking for the appointment of a select committee of five, because I deem the matter so very grave that it is due to my colleague, due to the Provost Marshal General, and due to the country that the subject shall be further investigated. And in view of the complimentary remarks which my colleague has made, I am confirmed in the design of putting in a disclaimer, which I had intended to do, and asking the Chair, if the House shall order this committee, not to place me upon it, as parliamentary courtesy might otherwise seem to require. I have a sufficient reason for it in the fact that the House has referred for investigation to the Committee on Public Expenditures, of which I am chairman, various important matters connected with custom-houses, and the internal revenue service at Boston and elsewhere; and I feel that we shall have as much as we can possibly do to carry out that resolution.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. I do not think the indulgence granted by the House extended this far. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] asked leave of the House to have a certain letter read from General Fry. Leave was granted, with the tacit understanding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] should have leave to reply. That he has done. Now, I do not think this matter should take up any further time of the members of this House, either in this House or in committees. And if I have the right, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The ruling has always been that when the House has permitted a personal explanation to be made, whatever legitimately or naturally grows out of it, in the opinion of the majority of the House, is in order. The Chair, of course, has no knowledge of what the resolution is, except from the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HULBURD]; but he supposes it relates to the very question which has been brought in controversy between the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. THAYER. Where a gentleman asks by way of personal explanation to have a paper read, with the understanding that another gentleman should be allowed to make a similar personal explanation, is it in order for any member of the House to introduce business, by resolution or otherwise, if it relates to the subject-matter of the personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. If it relates to that subject it is in order. Therefore the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] was in order when he submitted the motion, which went to the Committee on Printing under the law, that ten thousand extra copies of the communication from General Fry be printed for the use of this House.

The resolution of Mr. HULBURD was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members of this House be appointed to investigate the statements and charges made by Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING in his place last week against Provost Marshal General Fry; whether any frauds have been perpetrated in his office in connection with recruiting service; also, to examine into the statements made by General Fry in his communication to Hon. Mr. BLAINE, read in the House this day; with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. HULBURD] to modify his resolution so as to provide for the investigation of any charges made against Provost Marshal General Fry and his bureau.

Mr. ROSS. Might it not be well to enlarge the powers of the committee so that they can investigate whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has received more pay than he was entitled to receive?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to have that done. I hope the committee will report on that whether it is embraced in the resolution or not.

Mr. HULBURD. That is embraced in the resolution now, it being one of the statements contained in the letter of General Fry.

Mr. ROSS. That will do, then.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution of Mr. HULBURD.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that I have anything to say, and I shall not take very long to say it. I do not happen to possess the volubility of the gentleman from the Utica district, [Mr. CONKLING.] It took him thirty minutes the other day to explain that an alteration in the reporter's notes for the Globe was no alteration at all; and I do not think he convinced the House after all. And it has taken him an hour to-day to explain that while he and General Fry have been at swords' points for a year, there has been no difficulty at all between them. He has said that General Fry is of no consequence, that he is a mere clerk in the War Department. Yet he is a very sensitive clerk, and when he has been accused of all sorts of fraud, he should have a little chance to be heard.

Now, one single word. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has attempted to pass off his appearance in this case as simply the appearance of counsel. I want to read again for the information of the House the appointment under which the gentleman from New York appeared as the prosecutor on the part of the Government. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

SIR: I am instructed by the Secretary of War to authorize you to investigate all cases of fraud in the provost marshal's department of the western division of New York, and all misdemeanors connected with recruiting. You will from time to time make report to this Department of the progress of your labors, and will apply for any special authority for which you may have occasion. The Judge Advocate General will be instructed to issue to you an appointment as special judge advocate, for the prosecution of any cases that may be brought to trial before a military tribunal. You will also appear in behalf of this Department in any cases that it may be deemed more expedient to bring before the civil tribunals.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. A. DANA.

Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING.

Now, sir, I find in Brightly's Digest, page 821, section forty-six, that—

"No person who holds or shall hold any office under the Government of the United States whose salary or annual compensation shall amount to the sum of $2,500, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office."

Now, sir, I leave it for the House to decide whether the gentleman can get off under the technical plea that he was not a judge advocate. He cannot deny that he discharged the duties of judge advocate under the special commission which I have read, and he was paid for the discharge of those duties. The case falls under the same law as that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who, being elected a Representative in Congress while yet a major general, declined to receive any pay as a member until he had resigned his office in the Army and had taken his seat in this House. I have no suggestions to make about this, except that I consider the point well taken, and that in my view this committee, if appointed, ought to investigate the matter. I do not believe that the gentleman received the money rightfully, though I will say this much of him, if he will permit me, that I have no doubt he will restore it if convinced he has taken it improperly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say further in connection with this matter is, that what I stated the other day has, as I conceive, been fully, entirely, and emphatically vindicated by the record. I believe I have shown the members of this House that I am incapable of stating anything here for which I am not responsible—not exactly "here or elsewhere"—but responsible as a gentleman and as a Representative.

Mr. THAYER. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I sought the floor again to say this, which possibly I omitted to state before: that no commission was ever issued to me by the Judge Advocate General. For fear that I omitted to state it, I beg leave to say that no commission, paper, or authority whatever was ever issued to me except the letter of retainer which has been read, employing me to act, according to its language, before military courts and before other tribunals.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir. I do not wish to have anything to do with the member from Maine, not even so much as to yield him the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. All right.

Mr. CONKLING. I only want to say that the only authority under which I acted was that which has been read, and that I acted as counsel for the United States; and the business of counsel in that particular case I tried, as the case was tried before a military tribunal, was, of course, of the same general character that would have been done by a judge advocate, had there been a judge advocate for the court, just as in the trial of the conspirators, the distinguished gentleman who sits before me [Mr. BINGHAM] performed the same line of professional employment that a regular judge advocate would have performed had he been there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one thing further: if the member from Maine had the least idea how profoundly indifferent I am to his opinion upon the subject which he has been discussing, or upon any other subject personal to me, I think he would hardly take the trouble to rise here and express his opinion. And as it is a matter of entire indifference to me what that opinion may be, I certainly will not detain the House by discussing the question whether it is well or ill founded, or by noticing what he says. I submit the whole matter to the members of the House, making as I do an apology (for I feel that it is due to the House) for the length of time which I have occupied in consequence of being drawn into explanations, originally by an interruption which I pronounced the other day ungentlemanly and impertinent, and having nothing whatever to do with the question.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the defense of the gentleman from New York should be made before this committee and not before the House.

The SPEAKER. That is scarcely a point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. It is hardly worth while to pursue this controversy further; but still the gentleman from New York cannot get off on the technicality which he has suggested. He says that a commission never was issued to him. I understand him to admit that if a commission had been issued to him he could not have taken pay for both offices. Now, every one knows that those preliminary authorizations are the things on which half the business arising out of the war has been done. Men have fought at the head of battalions and divisions and Army corps without having received their formal commissions. The gentleman was just as much bound to respect the law under that appointment as though it had been a formal commission with the signature of the Secretary of War.

As to the gentleman's cruel sarcasm, I hope he will not be too severe. The contempt of that large-minded gentleman is so wilting; his haughty disdain, his grandiloquent swell, his majestic, supereminent, overpowering, turkey-gobbler strut has been so crushing to myself and all the members of this House that I know it was an act of the greatest temerity for me to venture upon a controversy with him. But, sir, I know who is responsible for all this. I know that within the last five weeks, as members of the House will recollect, an extra strut has characterized the gentleman's bearing. It is not his fault. It is the fault of another. That gifted and satirical writer, Theodore Tilton, of the New York Independent, spent some weeks recently in this city. His letters published in that paper embraced, with many serious statements, a little jocose satire, a part of which was the statement that the mantle of the late Winter Davis had fallen upon the member from New York. The gentleman took it seriously, and it has given his strut additional pomposity. The resemblance is great. It is striking. Hyperion to a satyr, Thersites to Hercules, mud to marble, dunghill to diamond, a singed cat to a Bengal tiger, a whining puppy to a roaring lion. Shade of the mighty Davis, forgive the almost profanation of that jocose satire!

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state at the conclusion of these personal remarks that, as the House had granted unanimous consent for a personal explanation, and it was presumed, of course, personalities would be indulged in, he has refrained from calling gentlemen to order. If any member had called to order, the Chair would at once have strictly enforced the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] to withdraw the motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. That committee has now as much as it can attend to, and beside that, the gentleman from Maine is on that committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and the reference would be wholly improper.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. THAYER's motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs; and it was also disagreed to.

Mr. CONKLING demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 236) to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish post roads, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of House bill No. 481, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage immigration,' approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels,' approved March 8, 1865, and for other purposes."

And then, on motion of Mr. ROSS, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

Also, the petition of E. S. Newell, of Shoreham, Vermont, for a reduction of the tax on agricultural implements.

Also, the petition of Joel Colvin, and 11 others, of Danby, Vermont, asking an equalization of taxation on agricultural productions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 24th ultimo, a report from the Adjutant General covering all the evidence upon which the award of the commission appointed to examine the different claims to the reward offered for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis was based, including copies of the report of Lieutenant Colonel D. B. Pritchard, of the fourth Michigan cavalry, and of Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, of the first Wisconsin cavalry, and stating that no orders were on record in the War Department under which those officers acted.

Mr. WILSON. I move the reference of that communication to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 24th ultimo, calling for copies of orders of that Department which deprive officers of the Navy, who are not on duty, of certain privileges of citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of Nathan Webster, praying for compensation for property belonging to him taken during the war and used by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of C. M. Roy, W. S. Wortman, and others, citizens of Macomb county, in the State of Illinois, praying for the enactment of equal and just laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Macomb county, in the State of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a national Insurance Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have also a petition from one hundred and six citizens of Staunton, Augusta county, in the State of Virginia, stating that United States troops have recently been withdrawn, not only from that county, but from most of the surrounding counties in that section of the Shenandoah valley; and in view of the fact that threats are being made from various quarters against the lives and property of loyal men, and that, in their judgment, no protection or justice can be had through the civil courts or at the hands of the civil officers of the law, the petitioners pray that troops may be immediately forwarded to that locality, and that such measures be adopted as will insure to them justice in all matters of claims, and all other matters relating to them, in a military court, or in any other manner deemed advisable by Congress. The names of these petitioners are attached to the petition, together with an affidavit, stating that the parties who have signed it are personally known to the affiant, that they are citizens of said county of Augusta, and that the affiant verily believes the persons therein named are good and loyal citizens to the Government of the United States, and were such during the late war. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, as the parties seek military protection.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Menomonee, in the State of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Fox river, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN presented additional papers relating to the claim of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, for the issuance to them of $8,000 in legal-tender notes in lieu of notes which they allege were lost in the United States mails by the sinking of the steamer Quincy; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of Charles and Henry W. Spencer, of St. Louis, Missouri, praying for relief for an alleged illegal seizure of their trading boat, O. K.; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Ethan Ray Clarke and Samuel Ward Clarke, praying for the confirmation to them of the title to certain lands purchased of John Underwood by their grandfather, under a grant from the Spanish Government; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of W. M. Langhorn, and some forty-eight other persons, citizens of the city and neighborhood of Lynchburg, in Virginia, stating that by an act passed in 1861 by the Legislature of Virginia, some of the petitioners were incorporated into a body-politic and corporate for the education of the deaf and dumb and blind, and among others the deaf and dumb and blind negroes who were then in the State of Virginia. They state that emancipation has increased the number calling for such education very much; that they propose to teach them some art or handicraft, but find it impossible to accomplish the object they have in view if they are subjected to State and Federal taxation; and they pray that Congress may exempt them from the taxation of the United States. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOWE. Yesterday, while I was attempting to make a personal explanation of a dispatch found in the columns of the New York Herald, I was understood by the reporter of the Associated Press to quote a remark from the Postmaster General. The Globe will show that the quotation I made was from the First Assistant Postmaster General. I hope the reporter for the Associated Press will make the correction, as it is due to the Postmaster General that it should be made and as widely disseminated as the mistake was. It was undoubtedly a mistake.

BURNING OF COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I received yesterday a note, dated the 21st of April, from General Wade Hampton, who is known to the members of the Senate as having actively participated in the war of the rebellion, sending me a formal letter dated on the same day, in which he complains that injustice has been done him by a letter from General Sherman in relation to the burning of the town of Columbia, South Carolina. I can better make the writer understood by reading that portion of the letter, and I proceed to do so:

"A few days ago I saw in the published proceedings of Congress that a petition from Benjamin Rawls, of Columbia, South Carolina, asking compensation for the destruction of his house by the Federal Army in February, 1865, had been presented to the Senate, accompanied by a letter from Major General Sherman. In this letter General Sherman uses the following language: 'They [the citizens of Columbia] set fire to thousands of bales of cotton rolled out into the streets and which were burning before we entered Columbia. I myself was in the city as early as noon, and I saw their fires and knew that efforts were made to extinguish them; but a high and strong wind kept them alive. I gave no order for the burning of your city, but on the contrary, the reverse, and I believe the conflagration resulted from the great imprudence of cutting the cotton bales, whereby the contents were spread to the winds so that it became an impossibility to arrest the fire. I saw in your Columbia newspapers the printed order of General Wade Hampton, that on the approach of the Yankee army all the cotton should thus be burned, and from what I saw myself, I have no hesitation in saying that he was the cause of the destruction of your city.'

That ends the quotation from General Sherman, and then General Hampton proceeds to say:

"This grave charge made against me by General Sherman having been brought before the Senate of the United States, I am naturally most solicitous to vindicate myself before the same tribunal. But my State has no representation in that body."

And therefore he writes to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Read it all.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will.

"Those who should be our constitutional representatives and exponents there are debarred the right of entrance. In those Halls there are none who have the right to speak for the South; none to participate in the legislation which governs her; none to impose the taxes she is called on to pay; and none to defend her or to vindicate persons from misrepresentation, injustice, or slander. Under these circumstances I appeal to you in the confident hope that you will use every effort to see that justice is done in this matter. I deny emphatically that any cotton was fired in Columbia by my order; I deny that the citizens 'set fire to thousands of bales rolled out into the streets'; I deny that any cotton was on fire when the Federal troops entered the city. And I most respectfully ask Congress to appoint a committee, charged with the duty of ascertaining and reporting all the facts connected with the destruction of Columbia, and thus fixing upon the proper author of that enormous crime the infamy he so richly deserves. I am willing to submit her case to any honest tribunal. Before any such, I pledge myself to prove that I gave positive orders, by direction of General Beauregard, that no cotton should be fired; that not one bale was on fire when Sherman's troops took possession of the city; that he promised protection to the city, and that in spite of this solemn promise his soldiers burned it to the ground, deliberately, systematically, and atrociously. I therefore most earnestly request that Congress may take prompt and efficient measures to investigate this matter fully. Not only is this due to themselves and to the reputation of the United States Army, but also to justice and to truth. Trusting that you will pardon me for troubling you,

"I am, very respectfully,"

"WADE HAMPTON."

Mr. President, I need not say that I have not the slightest suspicion, even, that the charge which the writer of this letter supposes General Sherman to be subjected to is true. There must be a mistake somewhere. It is equally impossible to those who know General Sherman to suppose that he did not believe everything that he stated in the communication which is here quoted. Whether he was misinformed, or whether General Hampton was misinformed, I know not. It is due, however, to an acquaintance with General Hampton, commenced long before this rebellion broke out, that I should say that in point of private character, in point of veracity, he stood as high as General Sherman can stand now; and that is giving him as much praise as can be bestowed upon him. I know not how his object can be accomplished, and I will therefore ask that the letter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not suppose that the Senate would be willing to appoint a special committee to investigate the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will excuse me for a moment, I desire to say a word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely wish to make a suggestion that it may be put on record.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I only desire to say that this practice of reading in the Senate private letters, with reference to complaints and difficulties between gentlemen out of doors, and calling the attention of the Senate to them, is a practice which has grown up lately, which is very wrong, and which takes up a great deal of our time, and is very improper. Here is a question of veracity, or something of the sort, between two gentlemen, neither of whom is a member of this body, one a general in our Army and one a general in the rebel army. This is not the place to settle those questions. The practice that has grown up even in public speeches, or speeches addressed to the Senate, of reading private letters without signatures, or at least not reading the signatures, or even with the signatures, is only calculated to take up time; it has nothing to do in reality with the business of Congress. More especially is it objectionable to bring up matters in reference to gentlemen out of doors and calling on the Senate or the House of Representatives to hear their differences and settle them. If they ask any action of Congress, let them address a memorial to this body or the other House in proper shape and call for action.

I, of course, do not wish to blame my friend from Maryland; he is only following the example of others in relation to the matter; but I wish to enter my protest against the whole thing, and in future I give notice that I shall object to the reading of any of these letters with reference to out-of-door matters with which we really have nothing to do. We are not a tribunal, or an arbitration, or referees to settle these difficulties between gentlemen out of doors, whatever may be their position and however high. We have nothing to do with them. It only interrupts the proceedings of this body and takes up time which should be devoted to other things, in my judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot allow the charge of this most impudent rebel against the whole of an army to be entered upon the records of the Senate without a prompt answer, and I think it will be a very complete one. The honorable Senator from Maryland vouches for the previous good character of General Wade Hampton prior to this rebellion. Perhaps he would not be willing to vouch for it if he knew the entire history of Wade Hampton during this war.

The charge made by General Sherman was made in the course of his official duties in an official report. A citizen of Columbia, South Carolina, by the name of Benjamin Rawls, believing himself to be aggrieved, sent a petition to this body, and asked me to present it, claiming damages for property alleged to have been destroyed by our army in the burning of Columbia. In presenting that petition, I stated to the Senate the reasons, which in my judgment were sufficient, why it should not be granted; and read a statement from General Sherman, showing that the burning of Columbia was really caused by the previous policy of Wade Hampton. General Sherman did not allege that Wade Hampton set fire to the city of Columbia; or that his rebel army set fire to the city of Columbia, or that he ordered it to be done; but simply, that his previous orders were the inducing cause of the burning of Columbia. I asserted that citizens or inhabitants of Columbia itself did set fire to Columbia, and that the scattering of cotton in the open streets and squares spread the fire that destroyed it; and therefore Benjamin Rawls must look to his neighbors or to General Wade Hampton, who scattered this cotton, for his loss.

Now, sir, this letter does not deny the real assertion made by General Sherman. I have the papers now before me showing conclusively from official records that General Sherman's assertion was true, and that he was justified in saying that General Wade Hampton was the cause of the burning of Columbia. He commanded the rear guard of the rebels, and, indeed, made but little opposition to the march of General Sherman through the vaunted State of South Carolina, except the burning of cotton. This was the only resistance our army met in all its march through South Carolina, unless it would be probably the skirmish at the Salkahatchie. In other States General Sherman found an enemy, but in that pestilent State General Hampton resisted him by burning cotton. I have here upon this very point the official record of General Howard, who certainly for veracity would stand against Wade Hampton or any of his set. On the 16th of February of last year General Howard in his official report said:

"The mounted infantry crossed the Saluda first, supported by some infantry of General Hazen's division, and pushed on rapidly, driving the enemy across the Broad river. The attempt was to save the bridge, but it failed, since the bridge had been covered with rosin and light-wood in such manner as to burst instantaneously into a flame; and this occurred even before all the rebel cavalry had crossed over. The remnant escaped northward."

"About 10 a. m., February 17, the mayor of Columbia, with a flag of truce, met Colonel Stone, and formally surrendered the city to him. The general-in-chief had instructed me to destroy certain public buildings, but to spare institutions of learning, asylums, and private dwellings."

"I transmitted these instructions to Major General John A. Logan, whose troops were to have charge of the city."

"He directed Major General Woods to place suitable guards. As soon as the bridge was completed, I crossed with General Sherman, and rode to the town with him, a distance of about three miles. The ground was dry, the wind blowing hard, so that the dust almost blinded us. As we entered the city the negroes and many white people collected at the corners of the streets, and greeted the general with loud cheering."

"In the main street was a large quantity of cotton partially consumed by fire. Some men were at work trying to extinguish the fire with a very poor engine. We remarked that the loose cotton was blown about in every direction, and the shade trees were so completely covered with bits of cotton as to remind me of a grove in Maine after a snow storm."

"The guards were carefully established in different streets, and seemed to be attending to their duty very faithfully."

"I noticed a few men under the influence of liquor, and immediately directed that they should be placed under guard. I have been thus particular in narrating these preliminary incidents, because there followed one of the most terrific scenes that I have ever witnessed, and we are charged by the 'rebels' with its inception. Thinking everything was very orderly and the city police in the best of hands, I selected a house and hoped to get a little rest. But it was hardly dark before a fire broke out in the vicinity of Main street and spread rapidly. I learned, moreover, that quantities of liquor had been given to the soldiers by certain people, who hoped in this manner to conciliate them and get their protection. And it is certainly true that many of our men and some of our officers were too much under the influence of drink to allow them to properly discharge their duty. Strenuous efforts, however, were made to arrest the flames. General Woods sent in a fresh brigade, and after ward General Hazen still another."

"During the night, I met Generals Logan, Woods, and other general officers, and they were taking every possible measure to stop the fire, and prevent disorder."

"Nevertheless, some escaped prisoners, convicts from the penitentiary, just broken open, army-followers, and drunken soldiers, ran through house after house, and were doubtless guilty of all manner of villainies; and it is these men that I presume set new fires further and further to the windward in the northern part of the city."

"Old men, women, and children, with everything they could get out, were herded together in the streets. At some places we found officers and kind-hearted soldiers protecting families from the insults and roughness of the careless. Meanwhile the flames made fearful ravages; and magnificent residences and churches were consumed in a very few minutes."

"After about two thirds of the city, all the business part of the town, including the old State House, had been destroyed, the wind shifted to the east, and the fire was stayed."

"The next morning showed very little of Columbia, except a blackened surface peopled with numerous chimneys, and an occasional house that had been spared, as if by miracle."

"I believe that the rebels who blew up the depot, scattered the cotton over the city and set fire to it, and took no reasonable precaution to prevent the destruction of Columbia, are responsible for the suffering of the people."

"Neither the general-in-chief, nor any of his lieutenants, have ever sanctioned any conduct so evidently against the dictates of humanity."

"The seventeenth corps followed the fifteenth across the Saluda and Broad, and encamped outside of the city to the northeast. The fifteenth corps encamped to the east and south, except the garrison of the city."

Such is the testimony of General Howard, who marched in with the advance of the army, with the general-in-chief. And it shows clearly that when our army entered Columbia the rebels under Hampton had prepared the city for conflagration, and that its own inhabitants, including negroes and escaped convicts, were maddening themselves with liquor, and that General Sherman and all under him did all they could to save the city from the destruction prepared for it by escaping rebels.

I have here also a private letter, written recently, since Wade Hampton denied this charge, by General Howard to General Sherman, from which I will read a short paragraph:

"On examining my report for the South Carolina and North Carolina march, I find that I was quite explicit in my account of the burning of Columbia. My impression then was that the fire was set originally by the enemy. At Midway I protected the houses, including Simms's library, as long as we halted at that place. General Blair furnished the guards."

"I did not see Wade Hampton's orders for burning cotton, but know that his forces did burn cotton in our front constantly. Wheeler's letter to me, which you received and answered, shows that the burning had official sanction."

I now add to the testimony of General Howard the statement of General Charles H. Woods, of a recent date, and after he had seen in the papers the recent statement of Hampton. It is clear and explicit. It is from the general in immediate command, and who must have known the facts much better than Wade Hampton, then at a safe distance.

HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF ALABAMA,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, April 7, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 2d instant has just reached me, and I hasten to reply as you request.

My official report of the campaign in South Carolina does state in general terms the facts as to the burning of Columbia in nearly the same language, and to the same purport as you claim. I will, however, further state in detail, that at the time of the capture of Columbia, South Carolina, I commanded the first division, fifteenth Army corps, and that the third brigade of that division was the first body of Federal troops that entered and took possession of the city.

The place was formally surrendered to my command through the mayor, but when the troops marched in considerable skirmishing was necessary to drive out the rear guard of General Wade Hampton's command, and the numerous stragglers left from the rebel forces.

I was among the first to enter the city after its occupation, and found the guards and patrols established by the commanding officer of the advance brigade well posted, and in the earnest and vigilant performance of their duty. But the streets were full of half-drunken citizens and negroes, and escaped or released convicts, who seemed to me to have been intentionally turned loose for the purpose of sacking the city, and thereby throwing odium upon the Federal occupation. I was also informed, and was satisfied, that many of the worst disposed of our own men were met by such citizens and negroes, furnished with intoxicating liquors, and every effort made to induce them to join in the work of destruction. I am bound to assert that every effort was made by my officers and myself to prevent such outrages, and I believe those efforts were generally successful. The streets in many portions of the city were filled with long rows or piles of cotton which had been set on fire, and prompt orders were given and earnest endeavors made by the troops to extinguish the flames, to save as far as possible all private property, and protect it from pillage. My belief is that the retiring rebel forces under command, as I am informed, of General Wade Hampton, intended to destroy all cotton left in the city, to save it from Federal possession, but that they did not intend to burn the city. No proper precautions, however, were taken, and we found the city actually in the hands of the reckless and irresponsible stragglers, both white and black, that I have before spoken of.

What outrages, robberies, or incendiary acts they may have committed I cannot state, but I do know that every effort was made to check them.

The burning cotton, exposed to a fearful wind blowing across the city, was not to be extinguished by human effort. As the bales burst large masses of flaming material were lifted by the wind and sent on and over roofs, in windows and doors, and against fences; and as water was very scarce no efforts of the troops proved of any avail until the fire nearly reached the State House.

I am satisfied that everything saved was owing to the energy of our men, and that nothing more could have been done. I was personally present in the city and am personally cognizant of the fact that my officers and men did their duty faithfully and well in saving and not in destroying property, either public or private.

The third brigade of my division was composed entirely of Iowa troops, and were among the best disciplined and best disposed soldiers of the Army, and were commanded by Colonel George A. Stone, of the twenty-fifth Iowa volunteers, an officer and a gentleman well known to me as a strict disciplinarian and an excellent soldier.

About nine o'clock at night, when the fire was at its height, I sent in another brigade of nearly two thousand men, under command of Brevet Brigadier General William B. Woods, with orders to do everything in their power to extinguish the flames. These men worked hard all night, and until the fire was extinguished.

I repeat that the destruction of the best business portion of Columbia was the perhaps unexpected result of the attempt of the rebel forces to prevent cotton falling into the hands of the Government of the United States, and must have so far received the sanction or order of the commanding officer of those forces, who I am informed and believe was General Wade Hampton.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES R. WOODS,

Brevet Major General, Commanding.

Major General W. T. SHERMAN, U. S. A., Commanding Military Division of the Mississippi, St. Louis, Missouri.

I now present to the Senate a letter written to me by General Slocum, probably in consequence of what was said here on a previous occasion. It may not bear upon the specific charge of the burning of Columbia, for General Slocum's army did not enter that city, but it shows very clearly the conduct of the rebel army, commanded in part by this man who now arraigns our army for barbarity:

SYRACUSE, NEW YORK, April 10, 1866.

MY DEAR SIR: I see that it is charged that our troops were guilty of great barbarity and cruelty on our campaign through South Carolina. While I am willing to admit that there were some bad men in every corps, and that isolated cases of a violation of the rules of war occurred, yet, in view of all the circumstances, I think the behavior of the army was as good as could have been anticipated.

My command (the left wing) crossed the Savannah river at Sister's ferry, and the men, upon entering the State of South Carolina, found their road filled with torpedoes so arranged that it was impossible to avoid them; and men saw their comrades mangled, and in many instances killed, in this barbarous manner, while they were quietly marching in column. Is it surprising that, under such circumstances, officers found it difficult to prevent their men from committing some acts in retaliation? I think not, yet I never found any difficulty in preserving order on entering a city or a large village, where guards could be placed.

On our approach to Winnsboro, South Carolina, we found the place on fire. I was informed by citizens that the fire was the work of a negro woman. The citizens appeared panic-stricken, and were doing little to save the place. My soldiers cheerfully and zealously worked to extinguish the fire, and the most perfect order was preserved while we remained in the town. When we left the leading citizens were very profuse in expressions of gratitude for the kind treatment they had received.

In passing judgment upon the officers and men of Sherman's army on this campaign it should not be forgotten that the events which led to the war were familiar to every soldier of that army. The boast made by some of the leading citizens of South Carolina at the commencement of the war, that they had labored thirty years to destroy the Union, their indignant denials that the people of South Carolina were of the same race as the hated Yankees, and their advocacy of "raising the black flag," were matters as well understood in Sherman's army as they were in the city of Charleston. This knowledge, on the part of the soldiers, together with the violation of the rules of war by the people of the State in planting torpedoes in places remote from any fortification or city rendered the duty devolving upon the officers a very difficult one.

I claim that the conduct of my command was not such as to justify the charges brought against the army.

Yours truly,

H. W. SLOCUM.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I have also here a report from General Logan, whose report in almost every particular confirms that of General Howard. I have also the report of General Stone, the gentleman who was met three miles from the city by the mayor and the authorities of the city. It seems that General Stone got into a carriage to ride in with those authorities, and on the way they saw a portion of Wade Hampton's cavalry driving our advanced guards back; and Colonel, now General, Stone, left the carriage and went at the head of a small force of a certain regiment of Iowa troops and drove Wade Hampton's cavalry into the city, and followed them into the city; and he states that while he was on the road to the mayor's office to receive the formal surrender of the city, and there to raise the national flag, whisky and liquors of various kinds were freely distributed to and by the negroes and citizens of Columbia before a single American soldier arrived there, and that then the cotton was scattered all over the city; and I have no doubt that probably these escaped convicts, or the negroes maddened by liquor, rejoicing at their liberation, might by accident, or perhaps for reason, for enmity, have set fire to the city and caused the subsequent destruction; but when Wade Hampton, who had taken care to retreat before this occurred, charges our soldiers with this infamy of burning private houses he makes a charge that cannot be sustained.

He says that—

"About eight o'clock the city was fired in a number of places by some of our escaped prisoners and citizens, (I am satisfied I can prove this,) and as some of the fire originated in basements stored full of cotton it was impossible to extinguish it."

The fire-engines were ordered out, but the flames could not be stopped, the buildings were old, nearly all wooden ones, and the wind blowing almost a gale.

"At half past eight p. m. I received orders that I was relieved by Brevet Brigadier General Woods, and I sent the brigade to camp about one mile out of town, but remained in the city myself working all night to assist in extinguishing the fire."

Such, Mr. President, is the evidence I presented to the Senate to show that the statements made by General Sherman were justified by the facts. And, sir, I could add the express order of General Wheeler, under which Wade Hampton acted, requiring all cotton in the line of General Sherman's march to be burnt, and that it in fact was burnt. In the light of these facts what shall be said of this letter? He is an unpardoned rebel, living only by the mercy of this Government which he struggled to overthrow, cursed with treason, and responsible for the lives of thousands of the people of his own State, a fit sample of an army which converted bones of human beings into wearing-ornaments, and which starved thousands and tens of thousands of brave men whose misfortune it was to fall prisoners into their hands.

Examine his letter. He says he did not order this cotton to be set on fire, but he ordered or allowed cotton bales to be cut in the public square, and thus scattered the cotton all over the city, and made it so combustible that a negro, or a citizen, or an escaped convict, or any accident might set fire to the city of Columbia, and thus destroy the city. I then repeat that Wade Hampton and his associates did, in their insane desire to destroy cotton to prevent it from falling into our hands, cause the burning of the city of Columbia. But he says he did not order it to be burnt in Columbia. In this letter, which is written rather like a politician than a candid man, as I supposed Wade Hampton was, he says he did not order the burning of the cotton in Columbia. He does not deny that he ordered it to be burnt everywhere else. In Columbia probably it was not set fire to by his order, but he scattered it in such way that the accident which followed destroyed the capital of the State of South Carolina. I must confess that I do not shed many tears over the result, but in fixing the guilt of this charge I wish to fix it on the men who were themselves the cause of it.

It seems to me the impudence of this whole proceedings passes all imagination. He writes here to the Senate of the United States that the State of South Carolina is excluded from representation. Why? Because the authorities of the State of South Carolina violated their oaths; their people violated their duty of allegiance to support this Government. They had, for years, been trying to get out of this Government, and now they whine like whipped curs because they cannot come back here the moment they are whipped. It is degrading for a man occupying the position of Wade Hampton and all those leading rebels to beg and whine because they for a time are excluded for their crimes from representation here. They struggled for years to destroy their hateful association with Yankees. Why are they so anxious to resume these relations? The whole letter, not only the facts, but the omissions of fact and the impudence which dictated it, surpass all belief. Is it not strange that men like Wade Hampton, who were the original cause of this war, whose foolish bravado excited their people to resist the national Government, when they have felt the power of the national Government, come whining here with such a letter as this. When it is held up and read in the American Senate, it exhibits an amount of impudence that I did not conceive even a South Carolina rebel possessed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Maine would not have supposed that I presented a letter which was intended to be private, to the Senate, for nobody finds more fault with the practice of reading letters, particularly without giving the names of the writers, than I do and have done from the first. The letter which I have presented was sent to me for the purpose of being presented, and I considered it as in the nature of a memorial.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will understand me. I did not apply that portion of my remarks to him particularly; but that has been practiced here, and I think the practice is very objectionable. It has grown up recently. I think it is equally objectionable to read a letter not addressed to the Senate, and to call for the Senate's attention, and take up the Senate's time in relation to it. Congress is to be addressed in a certain form; private matters are entirely out of place; and before I sit down I ask the Chair, what question is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reference of the letter offered by the Senator from Maryland to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly; but I had a right to ask that question.

Mr. JOHNSON. The letter which I have presented to the Senate was not presented on my own judgment alone. I showed it to the honorable member from Ohio, and he advised me to present it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Bad advice, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought that the letter might as well be presented and the statement which I have made in connection with it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I presented it because the writer requested me to present it. It is not in the form of a memorial, but it is designed to effect the object of a memorial, to get the facts in which he supposes his reputation to be involved inquired into. Now, I am as far from justifying the conduct of General Hampton as the honorable member from Ohio. I think that in connection with all those who participated in the rebellion he sinned very materially against his duty; but it is possible that he may have been under the impression that he was right in what he did because of the peculiar construction which upon a certain subject they gave to the Constitution of the United States.

As I have presented the letter, it is proper, perhaps, that I should say that I think my friend from Ohio does the writer injustice in saying that he is whining over the fact that the representatives of South Carolina are not upon this floor. There is nothing in the letter which can be considered as whining at all, if I understand what whining is. He refers to that fact as a reason for sending to me what he wishes to be presented to the Senate. He states distinctly that he sends the letter to me because his State is not represented here; but that is immaterial.

Nobody can think higher of the gallant general to whom we are indebted so much for the termination of the rebellion than I do; nobody has more absolute confidence in his veracity than I have; nobody thinks higher or has greater confidence in the veracity of General Howard than I have; but it is possible that, notwithstanding General Wade Hampton, against his duty to the United States, engaged in the rebellion, he has not lost that claim to veracity which he had before the rebellion commenced; and he stood before the rebellion commenced as high in that particular as any man that I ever knew. He desires—and it is a natural desire—as the city of Columbia was burned, to clear himself of the charge of having effected that catastrophe.

General Sherman's letter states that he saw in a paper printed in Columbia what professed to be an order from General Hampton directing the burning of the cotton. That he denies positively; he says he gave no such order.

But, sir, it is unnecessary, and as the honorable member from Maine intimates, it is unnecessarily trespassing on the time of the Senate, to pursue the matter further. All that I desire is that the paper shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, or allowed to lie on the table, just as may be the determination of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope neither.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland vary his motion so as to move that the letter lie on the table?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before any specific motion is made, I desire to say that I think the proper disposition of this matter would be to refuse to consider this letter even by laying it on the table. It has no business here. Neither has it any business before the committee. It is a mere private letter, and Senators ought not to ask action upon it. I hope we shall simply refuse to consider it in any way.

Mr. CONNESS. I only rise to say that I cannot vote to send this letter to any committee of this body for the purpose of vindicating the reputation of Wade Hampton or any of his kind of men; and I am somewhat astonished that the honorable Senator from Ohio should feel bound to controvert his statements here or to vindicate the character of the eminent general bearing his name, or that of the United States Army against the charges of Wade Hampton. A man who undertook to burn and destroy this Government might well be taken to be able to perform the act of burning and destroying a city. There is nothing, and never has been anything, in the fair proportions of the city of Columbia, in South Carolina, that compared with the majestic proportions and great value of this Government to the human race; and yet the man who put himself forward and foremost in the work of destroying the one sends a letter here, and we are asked to vindicate him against the charge of burning and destroying the other. I have nothing to say other than to put it in that light.

As to the complaint denominated "whining," for it comes very near that, that South Carolina is among the States not yet given representation in this body, that complaint comes now from many quarters—quarters from which, had it emanated one year since, it would have caused surprise to every honest person in the land.

It is time that the parties who make those complaints had become ashamed to make them and to repeat them. It is of no consequence whether those States were ever out of the Union or whether they are out of the Union now; we know that their people in the mass, under daring and impudent leaders, like the man who sends this letter here, undertook to destroy the Government; and it is our duty to say when they shall be entitled to participation in the Government that they thus undertook to destroy. There is no power in them nor in any representative friends that they can have here or elsewhere which can commend them to representation in the Congress of the United States until the sober judgment of the people shall determine that they are fit for such representation.

I, too, join the honorable Senator from Maine in saying that this letter should not be referred to a committee or laid upon the table. Let those men retire from public gaze and let them perform works meet for repentance for their great crimes before they impudently thrust themselves forward for purposes of representation or for the purpose of engaging us in vindicating what is already a reputation so damaged that it never can be vindicated or justified.

Mr. WILSON. I do not see any need of referring this matter; and I hope this paper will be withdrawn by the Senator from Maryland, that thus the question will be ended. I desire to get up a resolution offered by me some days since, and which it is very important should be decided one way or the other. I refer to the resolution to allow this Hall for the use of Mr. Murdoch to give a reading for the benefit of the National Home for the Orphans of Soldiers and Sailors. I will simply say that Mr. Murdoch, since the war commenced, has twice given readings in this Chamber; and on both occasions Mr. Lincoln attended the reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the morning hour be extended until half past one o'clock, in order that we may conclude the morning business. I hope that that will be done by general consent.

Mr. WADE. Say two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; but I want to get through with the Post Office appropriation bill to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us get through with this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to refer the letter read by him to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to amend that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADE. I now move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 203.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet called through the business of the morning hour, but if the Senator from Ohio presses his motion the Chair will put it.

Mr. WADE. If there is any more morning business I waive my motion for the present; if there is not I insist upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George P. Remsburg, praying for an appropriation to provide for the support and education of his son, Charles Remsburg, who lost an arm on the 13th of April, 1865, by a volley fired by the provost guard in a public street of the city of Frederick, Maryland, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of John Gordon, praying for additional compensation for services as messenger in the Post Office Department, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 294) for the relief of John Gordon. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 99) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Albany, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of said State, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 263) to authorize the Winona and St. Peter's Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river and to establish a post route, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 295) repealing the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland, so far as the same has been recognized or adopted in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 296) to incorporate the American Marine Insurance Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NEW YORK AND MONTANA IRON COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON. I now ask for the consideration of the resolution that I introduced some days ago, granting the use of the Chamber to Mr. Murdoch on Thursday evening next, for the purpose of giving a reading for the benefit of the National Home for the Orphans of Soldiers and Sailors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the morning business is disposed of, the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] takes precedence, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WADE. Then I insist on my motion to take up Senate bill No. 203 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not rise to discuss the merits of this bill, or to express an opinion as to whether it is wise or unwise for the Senate to pass it, but merely to place myself upon the record as being utterly opposed to the recognition of any such principle as is embraced in the bill. Senators who have read the bill have discovered that it completely overturns the whole land system of the United States. It proposes that a corporation created under the general laws of the State of New York, where a corporation can be created by any three, five, ten, or any other number of persons, for any purpose they please, may go into the Territory of Montana and there select twenty sections of land, make the surveys themselves, without any regard to whether they conform to the meridian lines or the base lines or the township lines of the United States surveys, and shall have a preemption right for two years, at the end of which time they shall be permitted to pay the Government price for the land. I find that there is no provision in the bill, so far as I can see, that will prevent the timber on the land from being utterly destroyed and used up for the purposes of the furnaces which it is proposed to establish there. I do not recognize the propriety of allowing a little corporation in an outside State to go into any of the new States or into any of the Territories and occupy land in the way in which this bill proposes.

I have only said this in order that I may not preclude myself in the future from occupying the position which I now do. I have no disposition to call for the yeas and nays, because I suppose the bill will pass anyhow.

Mr. WADE. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate now, for I believe the objects and purposes of the bill are fully understood by the Senate. It is thought, I believe, by every one who has examined the subject, that nothing would so much tend to develop the mining and other interests in the Territory of Montana, and to facilitate the construction of the Pacific railroad in that direction, as by some method of this kind to have furnaces erected there, so that iron may be manufactured from the ores lying in that country, instead of being transported over the continent at a most ruinous expense. A company was formed of men, I believe as good as can be found in New York and Michigan and other places, who thought they might make it a profitable business for themselves, provided they could have the privilege of purchasing enough timber land to carry on their furnaces when they get there. As I stated the other day, and I would not repeat it now but for the fact that some Senators are present who were not here then, this enterprise could not be entered upon with any hope of success if, while this company were laying out the large capital which it will take to begin this business, some $150,000 or $200,000 at least, individuals could go on and take possession of all the wood land about them. The company then would be at the mercy of men who had not laid out a dollar for this purpose. They desire, therefore, to acquire sufficient wood land; and they cannot get the wood land unless they purchase the title to the land itself. They ask Congress to enable them, in advance of the surveys there, to purchase this land at the Government prices, excluding them from all right to any minerals except iron and coal, or for using the grant for any other purpose except what is necessary to enable them to go on with this enterprise.

I believe every one admits that it will be highly beneficial to the people of that Territory and facilitate its settlement and the development of its mineral interests should this be done. Of that I have no doubt, and it seems to me nobody can have any doubt. Whether this will be profitable to those who invest in it is a thing which they must answer for themselves, but the object is certainly laudable. This bill does nothing more than anticipate, perhaps, by two or three years, the surveys of the land in that Territory. It is so remote that it has not been surveyed, though mining interests have sprung up which have carried a number of inhabitants there who would not have got there, probably, in a century had it not been for the mines discovered there. It is necessary, therefore, that these interests should be developed in advance, and every one who has turned his attention to the subject, so far as I have seen, believes that this bill will be beneficial, and I think nearly every one is in favor of it. The bill is guarded at every point. This company can acquire nothing but the title to this land, and they are to pay for it the same price, probably, that would be paid for it at some future period when it shall be surveyed and when anybody can go on and get it at the same price this company now offer. That is all there is about it. I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was passed.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses of Congress on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives concur in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh amendments of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives concur in the sixth amendment of the Senate, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all after the word "act" in the fourth line of said amendment.

DANIEL CLARK,
LYMAN TRUMBULL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BURTON C. COOK,
SAMUEL McKEE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 481) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 545) making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 197) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. WILSON. I now ask that the resolution be taken up allowing the use of the Hall to Mr. Murdoch.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 27th of April:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be granted to James E. Murdoch, Esq., on Thursday evening, May 3, for the purpose of giving a reading for the benefit of the fair to be held in this city for the National Home for the Orphans of Soldiers and Sailors.

Mr. RIDDLE. When this resolution was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts last week I objected to its reception. The reasons which induced me to object then actuate me now in opposing its adoption. I admit the talent and the ability of this great dramatist, but I am unwilling, by my vote at least, that this Hall, dedicated to legislation, shall be converted into a theater. There are plenty of halls in the city of Washington, and if this gentleman will get a hall for rent I pledge myself to take several tickets and to donate that money for the purpose which he is so anxious to assist, but never with my consent shall this Hall be converted into a theater or for any such purpose. You employ messengers and doorkeepers here, and you pay them a limited salary, and yet A, B, C, and D may come in here and get the privilege of the Hall, and you keep these messengers and doorkeepers here until midnight; you abuse your furniture; you wear out your carpets; and all this for nothing. Let Mr. Murdoch go elsewhere. I hope the Senate will not pass the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and will not grant the use of this Hall to James E. Murdoch or anybody else.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that during the war Mr. Murdoch devoted most of his time to the cause of the country and of the soldiers, and gave one of his own sons, who fell in the war. Twice during the war he gave readings in this Hall; and I remember that on both occasions President Lincoln was present, and also Mr. Chase, and many of the most eminent men of the country. The Chamber was crowded by most excellent people; perfect order was preserved; no harm came of it, and I apprehend no harm will come of it now. It is a contribution to the cause of an asylum for the orphan children of soldiers and sailors who fell in the war. I hope we shall grant this privilege. If hereafter it is the intention or the purpose of the Senate to exclude all exhibitions of this kind, or of any other, from the Hall, let us settle the point, but I hope we shall not begin on this occasion.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we will settle it now.

Mr. RIDDLE. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the House of Representatives have not passed a rule prohibiting the use of their Hall to any person except for legislative purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I understand they have done so at this session.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

That the Senate will not grant the use of the Senate Chamber for lectures or readings or other such purposes.

I am willing to contribute to the extent of my means for the purpose, but it is clear to my mind that this Chamber should not be granted for this purpose, and that until a rule on the subject shall be adopted the warm-hearted

Senator from Massachusetts who leads in these matters will pour in upon us here, as the representative of the lecturers of both sexes in the country, requests for the use of the Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know Mr. Murdoch, and I know that he deserves this compliment on the part of the Senate; still I would not grant it to him if it was a mere personal favor; but the cause for which he will read on Thursday next is one that appeals to us so keenly and so warmly that I cannot refuse the request. The ladies of this city, and, indeed, many ladies throughout the country, are very much interested in establishing an orphans' asylum for the children of soldiers and sailors who have been killed in the service. They are now making great efforts in that direction. They are holding their fairs. They are giving public concerts. I attended one the other night that yielded them from six hundred to a thousand dollars, and the performers were all ladies and gentlemen of the city who gave their services gratuitously, and the hall was given gratuitously. It seems to me, the Senate of the United States cannot deny this small privilege when the object is to educate the orphan children of the soldiers and sailors who gave their lives in our service. It is the cheapest mode in which we can aid these beneficiaries, and I am perfectly willing to grant the use of this Chamber for any such purpose. If it was to inure to the benefit of Mr. Murdoch, I would not do it; but I know his generosity, and I know the feeling that has actuated him during the whole war. He gave assistance to the soldiers and sailors. He went into the camp. He read for them and cheered them. Indeed, he devoted four years of active life almost to their service, and gave a son to the cause of the country. No one could appeal to us more strongly than he; but I would not grant the use of this Chamber even to him if it were to inure to his benefit. But in consideration of the cause for which he is to give this reading, I certainly am willing to devote the Hall for such a purpose at any time. I do not think the damage will be very material if the Hall is taken care of.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think we should put up the bars so that we shall not be able to grant the use of this Hall for any purpose, even if we do not let Mr. Murdoch have it. I think the Senate can consider each case when it is presented; and if they choose to grant the Hall for a particular purpose, I think we had better allow them to do it. I do not believe in passing an amendment to this resolution by which we shall deprive ourselves of the power of granting the use of the Hall to anybody we choose. I take it, the Senate will always have the good sense and judgment to be discreet in the matter, and will grant the use of the Hall to such persons as they may choose.

Mr. HOWE. I shall be very sorry if the Senate shall adopt this amendment; I shall be very sorry if the Senate shall decline to adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; and upon precisely the grounds suggested by the Senator from Ohio. I have no idea that this Senate Chamber ought to take the place of a concert hall or an assembly-room; but, on the contrary, I have no idea that this or any other place is so sacred as that you cannot allow, properly, the cause of humanity to be served in it. When you find any such erection in the United States, whether it be the Senate Chamber or a synagogue, I am for taking it down. Mr. Murdoch proposes to read somewhere one evening in the cause of humanity. The Senate Chamber of the United States should be the first, if it is the most convenient hall, whose doors should be opened to such a call.

Mr. CONNESS. It appears to be evident, at least to my mind, that the bars must not be erected, and that humanity has many advocates here. I am very glad that that is the case. I propose to be humane, as I believe it a duty to be, in another way. But my purpose was merely to develop the judgment of the Senate in regard to this question. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to grant the use of the Chamber for this purpose, I of course have little to say on the subject. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the resolution so amended as to apply only to the galleries, and not have the floor open.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that amendment will not be made.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not move the amendment if the Senator who has charge of the resolution does not assent to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the motion to amend the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; as the Senator from Massachusetts does not like it.

The resolution was adopted—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up the resolution granting the use of this Hall to Mrs. Walling for the purpose of a lecture. The resolution was passed some time since, but was subsequently reconsidered, and is now on the table, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has passed from the desk. It will be returned in a few moments.

Mr. WADE. I suppose it will come in presently. We all know what the resolution is. It is to grant this Hall to this lady to deliver a lecture pertaining to national affairs. It was offered here some time ago and was discussed at some length. She wishes to have the use of the Hall on Monday evening, the 7th instant, and I will state now, while the Clerks are hunting for the resolution, that I shall move to amend it in that particular, changing the time. The day fixed in the resolution originally I believe has passed. I had nothing to do with the introduction of the resolution, but since it has been introduced I have seen the recommendations of this lady, and they are from such respectable sources that I have no doubt of her character and no doubt that it is good and commendable. I understand that she lectured before the Legislature of Ohio, in the Hall of Representatives there, to the great acceptance of the members and the people who were present. I am informed that the papers spoke very highly of her lecture. I know nothing about it in any other way. I move to take up the resolution because it has been pending for a good while, and it appears to me that, under the circumstances, we ought to grant this request, even if we grant no other. It seems to me we shall not be dealing entirely right with this question unless we do so. We all understand the circumstances under which that resolution was reconsidered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague if the proceeds, or the money charged at the door, is to go to the benefit of this lady.

Mr. WADE. I do not know that she charges anything. I have no knowledge on that point. I do not know but that it is a gratuitous lecture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a free lecture.

Mr. WADE. Her lectures are said to be very interesting, and she is said to be very able. I am told that it is a gratuitous lecture. I hope that the use of the Hall will be granted under the circumstances; and then if it should please the Senate to pass a resolution that the Hall shall never be used for this purpose again, I have no objection. I think, under the circumstances in which this resolution has placed this lady, that in justice to ourselves and to her, we ought to give her the use of the Hall. The Hall has been used before. It was said in the debate on a previous day, that this Hall had never been used for a purpose of this sort before; but that is not so. I am told that Miss Grace Greenwood—I believe that is not her proper name, which I have forgotten—has lectured here in this Hall. I do not remember it, but I have no doubt it is so. I hope we shall grant the privilege under the circumstances.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there is no hurry about that matter, I hope the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill may be resumed, as it is the special order. My colleague can call up this resolution at any time.

Mr. WADE. I will move that Mrs. Walling be granted the use of this Hall to deliver her lecture on Monday evening next, the 7th instant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the resolution has passed from the desk. The impression of the Chair is that a motion to reconsider was entered and passed upon by the Senate and the resolution rejected. If that is so, no proceeding under that resolution would be in order.

Mr. WADE. It was not rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was reconsidered.

Mr. WADE. We reconsidered it, and left it there. I will consider this as a motion de novo then, but I wish it to be understood that the resolution was not rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain it as a new motion. It is moved that the use of the Hall be granted to Mrs. Walling for the purpose of a lecture on Monday evening next.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That assumes the form of a new resolution, and I object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

PACIFIC RAILROAD—EASTERN DIVISION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up the Post Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is the special order, and was only laid aside by common consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that there is a joint resolution reported by the Pacific Railroad Committee that ought to be taken up at a very early period and passed.

Mr. CONNESS. It will not excite any discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it will not excite discussion—and I do not believe it will, as I know something about it—I have no objection to that resolution being taken up.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 80.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order can be laid aside by common consent informally. No objection being made, it is laid aside temporarily by common consent, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the time for the completion of the first one hundred miles of railroad and telegraph line by the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company, (since called the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division,) mentioned in the tenth section of the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, of July 1, 1862, and in the fifth section of the amendment thereof, of July 2, 1864, until the 27th of June, 1866; and the time for completing each succeeding section of one hundred miles is to be reckoned from the 27th of June, 1866.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state, very briefly, that this measure is introduced on the recommendation of the President of the United States, founded upon a communication made to him by the Secretary of the Interior, in which it appears that the company in question have acted in good faith and have proceeded to complete nearly one hundred miles of the road already, but they will not be able probably to finish it entirely according to the terms of the original charter by the day fixed by the charter. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad had the subject under consideration, and they were unanimous in recommending the passage of this resolution granting further time to the company, until the 27th of June, 1866, and extending the time for the completion of the succeeding sections upon that road about one year forward, so as to make the time for the completion of the different sections correspond exactly with that fixed for the Omaha branch road. I beg to send to the Chair to be read a brief statement furnished to me by the president of the company, which will give to the Senate all the information which I think will be necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt whether it is worth while to read that communication.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no objection to the resolution at all.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 481) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 8, 1855, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 545) making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order of the day, being the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the following amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL:]

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term, during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with that, I desire to change the amendment which I have offered, slightly. I withdraw that amendment and offer the one which I send to the Chair as a substitute. It is the same with the exception of an addition at the close of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Illinois proposes as a substitute for his amendment—

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment being under my control, I suppose I can withdraw it and offer this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can modify his amendment. The amendment as now modified will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment, by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office; the cause, in case of removal, to be reported to the Senate at its next session.

Mr. HENDERSON. When the Senate adjourned yesterday evening, I was examining the power of Congress to pass the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois. At the time that I was interrupted by the remarks interjected by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] I had about closed the examination of the question in a political point of view; that is, I had examined the opinions of our distinguished men of various political parties since the organization of the Government down to the present time. I was just about to enter upon an examination of the question in a legal point of view, in order to show that the courts of the country have sustained the position which I took yesterday. I do not desire to take up much time of the Senate, and therefore shall hurry on with what little I have to say on the subject. I think that the view I take, and which I desire to see enforced after this long period of time—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is too much noise in the Senate. Senators will resume their seats.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot talk when there is so much confusion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order must be preserved. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is very difficult to proceed when I cannot hear myself. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the Senate, but this is an important question. I am perfectly aware that it is a proposition to change the entire policy of the Government on this subject, and some Senators who act with me politically have already expressed an opinion against the proposed amendment, doubting whether we have the constitutional power to adopt it. I am aware that the power claimed by the Executive to remove all officers in this Government has been exercised from the origin of the Government down to the present time. It is true, however, that during the first forty years of the Government, as I showed yesterday, but few removals were made; and indeed, looking back to that period, I find, as I shall attempt to show in a moment, that Mr. Madison, although he is the authority for this long-continued abuse, as I consider it, of the power of removal, declared at the time of the discussion to which I referred yesterday that if the President undertook to make removals without cause the exercise of that power on his part would be a just cause for impeachment, going to show most clearly that Mr. Madison never contemplated at the time the abuse of the position which he in the first debate on this subject took.

Before I proceed to examine the question legally—and I shall occupy but a short time in that examination—I propose to show the inducements held out to the American people for the adoption of the Constitution. It is a notorious fact that after the Constitution had been adopted by the Convention and placed before the people of the States an objection was urged on the part of many of the people against adopting it on account of the vast power of the Executive. That objection was answered in No. 77 of the Federalist. These papers were written and spread before the people for the purpose of inducing them to adopt the Constitution of the United States. In the seventy-seventh number, written by Mr. Hamilton, it is said:

"The consent of that body [the Senate] would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint. A change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, could not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the officers of the Government as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man in any station had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him by the apprehension that a discontinuance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, will in all probability be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government."

Thus it will be seen that one of the inducements held out to the people of the United States to adopt this instrument was that the President would have no power of removal except in conjunction with the Senate of the United States. As I stated yesterday, this wholesale removal of officers commenced, I believe, with General Jackson. It was continued by the Administration of Mr. Van Buren. Afterward, when General Harrison became President of the United States, it is a notorious fact to all the members of the Senate that the officers of the country were again changed. The officers who had been selected by the Democratic party during the twelve years of the Administrations preceding were turned out and Whigs were put in their places. Again, after Mr. Polk was elected in 1844, a wholesale removal was again carried on. In 1848, when General Taylor was elected, and under Mr. Fillmore's Administration, it is a notorious fact another wholesale removal of officers took place; and it has been continued from that day down to the present time; and I dare say it all proceeds from the idea advanced by Mr. Madison in the debate of 1789. It will be recollected, however, that in that debate Mr. Madison gave his opinion simply on the appointment of the chief executive officers who stand in a confidential relation to the President. It was in a debate on establishing the office of Secretary of Foreign Affairs, our present Secretary of State. There was some good reason for giving the power of removal to the President in cases of that sort. Objections were taken that the President should not have the power to remove even those officers, standing in so near and so confidential a relation to himself; and then Mr. Madison interposed his opinion, and becoming involved in the debate he afterward took the ground that the position was equally applicable to all officers; and therein consists the error, in my judgment, of this whole false theory that has grown up in the administration of the Government.

I have shown, I think, that it has been the opinion of the leading men of all the political parties of this country that this power of removal was one not granted to the President by the Constitution of the United States. It is notorious that Elbridge Gerry was opposed to it, and said that no such understanding ever existed in the Convention. Roger Sherman took the same ground. I will state another fact, while it is now before me, that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in 1789, composed of nine members, decided against the view of Mr. Madison, and a majority of them voted against the passage of the measure carried by John Adams's casting vote. Of the members of the Judiciary Committee at that day, composed of nine as able men as then lived, five voted against giving this power to the President. The Judiciary Committee of the body that adopted the provision by one vote only decided against the existence of the power to remove on the part of the President.

But I do not rest alone upon the opinions of individuals. I might refer to the very able opinion given by Mr. Hamilton in 1790, years after the decision of Congress so much relied on, in a letter written to a friend of his. After he himself had been in office as the head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government, he gave an opinion from experience that his first views of the Constitution were correct. I refer next to Judge Story, in his work upon the Constitution. He, referring to this original debate, says:

"That the final decision of the question so made was greatly influenced by the exalted character of the President then in office, was asserted at the time, and has always been believed. Yet the doctrine was opposed, as well as supported, by the highest talents and patriotism of the country. The public, however, acquiesced in this decision; and it constitutes, perhaps, the most extraordinary case in the history of the Government of a power, conferred by implication on the Executive by the assent of a bare majority of Congress, which has not been questioned on many other occasions. Even the most jealous advocates of State rights seem to have slumbered over this vast reach of authority, and have left it untouched, as the neutral ground of controversy, in which they desire to reap no harvest, and from which they retired without leaving any protestations of title or contest."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 2, sec. 1543.

Judge Story declares it as his opinion that the appointing power has the power of removal.

In regard to inferior officers we can give the appointing power entirely to the President; but if we do not, if we reserve the right to give our advice and consent before the appointment shall be made, then he is clearly of the opinion, as are the courts that have adjudicated upon the subject, that the Senate has a voice in saying whether the officer shall be removed or not.

I know that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] insisted yesterday that Mr. Madison ought to know, perhaps, better about this subject than anybody else. If Mr. Madison made no mistake on the question of constitutional power, he clearly made a very great blunder in regard to the future policy of this Government on the subject. He made predictions in regard to it which have not been fulfilled. For instance, Mr. Madison on the occasion of that debate said—I refer to Gales & Seaton's Debates, first volume, page 517—in answer to an objection which was urged by Mr. Gerry:

"The danger, then, consists merely in this, that the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motive which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by the House for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust."

Just think of it, Mr. President. Those gentlemen who laid the foundation of this great abuse of power in subsequent years of the Government took the ground that if the President did thus abuse the power thus put into his hands, he himself ought to be impeached! That was not the view alone of Mr. Madison; but Mr. Vining also, on page 531 of the same volume, remarked that—"If the President removes a valuable officer, which seems to be the great danger the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] apprehends, it would be an act of tyranny which the good sense of the nation would never forget."

Just think of it! Mr. Vining, who supported the power of the President, says it would be an act of tyranny on the part of the President to remove a valuable officer. Thousands and thousands have been removed under different Administrations, and removed without any cause whatever except that they disagreed politically with the power appointing them. If this idea of Mr. Madison and of Mr. Vining and of others in this debate which laid this unfortunate precedent in the administration of the affairs of this Government had prevailed, various Presidents would have been impeached and turned out of their offices. Mr. Baldwin also in that Congress said "that such an act would be an abuse of power." The mere removal of an officer for opinion's sake and without cause other than opinion's sake would be an abuse of power which, in the language of Mr. Madison, would subject the President himself to impeachment.

I think that, considering the fact that in every opinion that has ever been given by a leading statesman of this country from that day to the present, this debate in the First Congress is alluded to as authority, and considering the additional fact that in every judgment of a court from that day down to the present in which this question came under review, this debate has been alluded to for authority and the only authority on the question, we ought to examine the debate carefully, and if it turns out that the views entertained by distinguished men on the occasion have proven in the administration of the Government to be false and ruinous to the best interests of the Government, Congress ought now to resume the power with which it is clearly invested.

Without detaining the Senate I will allude to the first judicial opinion that I find upon this subject. It is reported in 1 Cranch, and I desire to call to this decision the attention of the Senator from Maryland, who expresses very confident views on this subject, and with whom I was disposed to agree when I commenced the examination of the subject. Relying entirely on the long practice of the Government, and supposing that it was utterly impossible that without good reasons the Government should have fallen into this practice, I was disposed at first to agree with him, but examination has led me to an opposite conclusion. The decision to which I now refer is that in the case of Marbury vs. Madison. Of course the question did not arise directly in that case, but a question akin to it did, and in one point of view perhaps the question itself arose; but it was avoided in the decision of the court, because it passed off on the power of the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, to issue the writ of mandamus to compel Mr. Madison to give the commission to Mr. Marbury. It seems that on the day before Mr. Adams went out of office, on the 3d of March, 1801, before the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson, he had appointed five justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, under a law which provided that they were to hold their offices for five years. The commissions were made out by Mr. Adams for those parties, signed by him, and sealed by the Secretary of State, but they remained in the office of the Secretary of State. The commissions were not delivered to the parties, and after Mr. Jefferson came into office, Mr. Marbury applied for a writ of mandamus to the Supreme Court of the United States, to compel the delivery of the commissions. The writ was to go against Mr. Madison, who was Secretary of State, to compel him to deliver the commissions to the parties to act as justices of the peace for five years. There is a concise statement of the case in the second volume of Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, page 406, section 1546, where it is stated thus:

"This subject was very elaborately discussed in the celebrated case of Marbury vs. Madison. Marbury had been appointed a justice of the peace of the District of Columbia for five years, according to an act of Congress, by President Adams, by and with the consent of the Senate. His commission had been signed by the President, and was sealed and deposited in the Department of State at the time of Mr. Jefferson's accession to the Presidency, and was afterward withheld from him by the direction of the latter. An act of Congress had directed the Secretary of State to keep the seal of the United States, and to make out and record and affix the seal to all civil commissions to officers of the United States, to be appointed by the President, after he should have signed the same. Upon the fullest deliberation, the court were of opinion that, when a commission had been signed by the President, the appointment is final and complete. The officer appointed has then conferred on him legal rights which cannot be resumed. Until that the discretion of the President may be exercised by him as to the appointment; but from that moment it is irrevocable. His power over the office is then terminated in all cases, where by law the officer is not removable by him. The right to the office is then in the person appointed, and he has the absolute, unconditional power of accepting or rejecting it. Neither a delivery of the commission, nor an actual acceptance of the office, is indispensable to make the appointment perfect."

Now I will read a few passages from the opinion of the Supreme Court in that case—it was the unanimous opinion of the court, pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall—to show most clearly that no idea ever entered the brain of a single judge that the President himself had the right of removal in cases where the law reserved to the Senate the power of consenting to the nomination before it was complete. The Senator from Maryland takes the ground—and I admit that he has the authority of the first decision by Congress, in 1789, but he has no other authority, because that decision is everywhere alluded to by the judges in their opinions, and they rely upon that alone—that the President has the right to remove an officer. I admit that that was the opinion given by Mr. Madison, but I desire to read from the opinion of the Supreme Court, to which I have called the attention of the Senate, as bearing on that point. The question arose whether under the circumstances I have stated the President had the right to withhold the commission. It was perfectly clear that the appointment had been made and confirmed by the Senate, but Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, refused to deliver the commission, which was tantamount to a removal of the officer after his appointment, and it was notorious that Mr. Jefferson, the President, had so ordered it to be done. The Supreme Court say—I read from 1 Cranch, page 156—

"Some point of time must be taken when the power of the Executive over an officer not removable at his will must cease."

What do the court mean by an officer not removable at the President's will?

"That point of time must be when the constitutional power of appointment has been exercised. And this power has been exercised when the last act required from the person possessing the power has been performed. This last act is the signature of the commission."

Again, in this opinion the court say—I read from page 162—

"It is, therefore, decidedly the opinion of the court that when a commission has been signed by the President the appointment is made; and that the commission is complete when the seal of the United States has been affixed to it by the Secretary of State."

"Where an officer is removable at the will of the Executive, the circumstance which completes his appointment is of no concern, because the act is at any time revocable; and the commission may be arrested, if still in the office. But when the officer is not removable at the will of the Executive, the appointment is not revocable and cannot be annulled. It has conferred legal rights which cannot be resumed."

They decided afterward in this case that this appointment was complete and perfect of itself, that it vested a right, and that the President could not in the particular case withhold the commission.

Mr. DIXON. Was that the case of a judge? Mr. HENDERSON. No; a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia. They only refused to issue the writ of mandamus, because they decided that in that case under the Constitution the Supreme Court had not original jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus; that it had only an appellate jurisdiction. It is true that the judiciary act of 1789 had attempted to give the Supreme Court the power to issue a writ of mandamus, but the court decided that the law in that respect was unconstitutional, because the Constitution only gave original jurisdiction in certain cases, and to issue a writ of mandamus was not one of those cases; and that view has been taken in some fifteen or twenty decisions between that time and this. But I read further:

"The discretion of the Executive is to be exercised until the appointment has been made. But having once made the appointment, his power over the office is terminated in all cases where by law the officer is not removable by him. The right to the office is then in the person appointed, and he has the absolute, unconditional power of accepting or rejecting it."

I am aware that the court decided in this case—and I think wrongly, if I may be permitted to differ from so able a court—that the President, after the confirmation by the Senate, has the right to withhold the commission, that the appointing power is not complete until the President signs the commission. The court seems to have fallen into this error from the fact that the two clauses—the one granting the appointing power, and the other providing that the President shall commission all officers thus appointed—occur in different portions of the Constitution, a circumstance which amounts to nothing, in my view of the Constitution. The granting of a commission by the President is a ministerial duty which he is compelled to do when he makes an appointment to the Senate and the Senate confirms it. It is, in my judgment, the absolute duty of the President under the Constitution of the United States to issue the commission in such a case, though I am aware the court in this case took a contrary view, and said it was necessary that the President shall have signed the commission and that it shall have been sealed in order to make it complete. Mr. Jefferson, in order to carry out this power of removal, continually resisted the idea that a writ of mandamus could go against any of the executive officers from any judicial tribunal whatever, which laid another foundation for error on this subject, in my judgment. When the President makes an appointment to an office, and the Senate confirm that appointment, it seems to me that the writ should go against the President to compel him to deliver the commission. The right seems to me to be, then, entirely perfect and complete; and the absurdity of the opinion of the court is found in their own reasoning, because they say it is not necessary that the officer shall have the commission in his pocket in order to discharge the duties of his office; that an appointment may be complete without the delivery of the commission; that it is not the same as the delivery of a deed in order to make a grant of land complete, but that a man may properly be in the discharge of the duties of an office before the actual delivery of the commission. But read further from this opinion. On page 166 the court say:

"If by law the officer be removable at the will of the President, then a new appointment may be immediately made, and the rights of the officer are terminated. But as a fact which has existed cannot be made never to have existed, the appointment cannot be annihilated; and consequently, if the officer is by law not removable at the will of the President, the rights he has acquired are protected by the law, and are not resumable by the President. They cannot be extinguished by executive authority, and he has the privilege of asserting them in like manner as if they had been derived from any other source."

It will be observed that the court decided in this case that a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia appointed for five years, an office created by Congress, had a right to his office, after confirmation by the Senate, and a right against the President, and that the President could not defeat his right in consequence of a refusal to deliver the commission. If that be so, by analogy of reasoning why is it that the President of the United States has the power after the commission has been delivered and before the expiration of the term of office to remove? Is there any such right? Surely this opinion of the court has no meaning in it if such be the correct view.

The question has been adjudicated several times, and I refer next to the opinion of the Supreme Court reported in 13 Peters, page 230. This is a case in which the same question came up, and I think the opinion of the court is perfectly clear. It was an application by Mr. Hennen for a rule upon the judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued against him requiring him to restore Mr. Hennen to the office of clerk of the district court. It seems that from 1834 to 1837 Judge Harper had been judge of that district court, and having the appointment of the clerk of the court, he had exercised that right and had appointed Mr. Hennen clerk. Afterward Hon. P. K. Lawrence was appointed judge, and immediately upon his appointment he removed Mr. Hennen and appointed Mr. Winthrop clerk. Mr. Hennen resisted the right to remove him, and asked for this rule. The Supreme Court decided, of course, as they had done in the previous case, that they had not authority to issue the writ; that it could not go; and they decided also that the district judge had a perfect right to remove the former clerk and to appoint a new one; but now I wish to read from the opinion of the court to show that in their view the appointing power is the only power that can remove; and if that be true wherever Congress reserves to the Senate the right of giving its advice and consent to a nomination, the officer so appointed cannot be removed without the consent of the Senate. I read from the opinion at page 259 of 13 Peters:

"It cannot for a moment be admitted that it was the intention of the Constitution that those offices which are denominated inferior offices should be held during life. And if removable at pleasure, by whom is such removal to be made? In the absence of all constitutional provision or statutory regulation, it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment."

The President cannot appoint in some cases without the concurrence of the Senate. Where ever the concurrence of the Senate is necessary the Senate is a part of the appointing power, and if a part of the appointing power, the court say that the same power that appoints must necessarily, in the absence of any law on the subject, have the power to remove. Again, on the same page, the court say:

"In all these Departments power is given to the Secretary to appoint all necessary clerks."

Alluding to the power of the Secretaries of the Executive Departments. We have by law given to those Secretaries the power to appoint their own clerks; the President has nothing to do with it; and the court held that where we have done that the heads of the Departments have the power of removal.

"In all these Departments power is given to the Secretary to appoint all necessary clerks (1 Story, 49.) and although no power to remove is expressly given, yet there can be no doubt that these clerks hold their office at the will and discretion of the head of the Department. It would be almost extraordinary construction of the law that all these offices were to be held during life, which must inevitably follow unless the incumbent was removable at the discretion of the head of the Department; the President has certainly no power to remove."

Why? Because he did not appoint; and he did not appoint because the law puts the appointing power elsewhere, and having put it elsewhere, if the officer is to be removed he must be removed by the power that appoints. The court say expressly that the power does not exist in the President to remove a clerk in one of the Departments; and yet it has been claimed on the floor of the Senate, and will be again claimed, that the power exists in the President to remove the head of a Department and to put somebody there who will remove the clerks. I deny that proposition. I say it is defeating entirely the Constitution; it is defeating the opinions of all, or a large majority, of the distinguished founders of our Government, leaving out Mr. Madison, and he surely, I admit, was as distinguished as any of them, and I give full weight to his opinions. It will be defeating the construction given by the courts in later days to the appointing power; and in the case from which I was quoting the court continue to say:

"These clerks fall under that class of inferior officers, the appointment of which the Constitution authorizes Congress to vest in the head of the Department. The same rule, as to the power of removal, must be applied to offices where the appointment is vested in the President alone."

If Congress gives to the President the power to appoint inferior officers, not reserving the right to consent to their appointment on the part of the Senate, then, say the court, the President has the right to remove of his own motion. Again the court say:

"And the Constitution has authorized Congress, in certain cases, to vest this power in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments; and all inferior officers appointed under each, by authority of law, must hold their office at the discretion of the appointing power. Such is the settled usage and practical construction of the Constitution and laws under which these offices are held."

I am aware that in the opinion of the court, in this case, they refer to the decision of Congress in 1789, but they clearly give their dissent from the construction then sanctioned by Congress. There is another opinion of the Supreme Court in 19 Howard, to which I will not refer; it is unnecessary to do so, because it establishes the same doctrine to which I have referred in the other two decisions. On this same question Judge Story, at page 400 of the second volume of his Commentaries, section 1538, says:

"The language of the Constitution is, that the President 'shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint,' &c. The power to nominate does not naturally or necessarily include the power to remove; and if the power to appoint does include it, then the latter belongs conjointly to the Executive and the Senate. In short, under such circumstances the removal takes place in virtue of the new appointment by mere operation of law. It results, and is not separable, from the appointment itself."

It will be observed that Judge Story takes the ground that if the President can remove at all, it is by virtue only of a new appointment, and inasmuch as that new appointment has to come before the Senate for confirmation, if it is an office of that character which requires the confirmation of the Senate, of course no removal can take place until the Senate has confirmed the new appointment; that is to say, the effect of the confirmation by the Senate removes the officer, and the officer is not removed until that confirmation occurs. He says further, section 1539:

"This was the doctrine maintained with great earnestness by the Federalist; and it had a most material tendency to quiet the just alarms of the overwhelming influence and arbitrary exercise of this prerogative of the Executive, which might prove fatal to the personal independence and freedom of opinion of public officers, as well as to the public liberties of the country. Indeed, it is utterly impossible not to feel that, if this unlimited power of removal does exist, it may be made, in the hands of a bold and designing man of high ambition and feeble principles, an instrument of the worst oppression and most vindictive vengeance. Even in monarchies, while the councils of state are subject to perpetual fluctuations and changes, the ordinary officers of the Government are permitted to remain in the silent possession of their offices, undisturbed by the policy or the passions of the favorites of the court. But in a republic, where freedom of opinion and action is guaranteed by the very first principles of the Government, if a successful party may first elevate their candidate to office and then make him the instrument of their resentments or their mercenary bargains; if men may be made spies upon the actions of their neighbors, to displace them from office; or if fawning sycophants upon the popular leader of the day may gain his patronage, to the exclusion of worthier and abler men, it is most manifest that elections will be corrupted at their very source, and those who seek office will have every motive to delude and deceive the people. It was not, therefore, without reason that in the animated discussions already alluded to it was urged that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment; that it would be a most unjustifiable construction of the Constitution and of its implied powers to hold otherwise; that such a prerogative in the Executive was in its own nature monarchical and arbitrary, and eminently dangerous to the best interests as well as liberties of the country. It would convert all the officers of the country into the mere tools and creatures of the President. A dependence so servile on one individual would deter men of high and honorable minds from engaging in the public service. And if, contrary to expectation, such men should be brought into office, they would be reduced to the necessity of sacrificing every principle of independence to the will of the Chief Magistrate or of exposing themselves to the disgrace of being removed from office, and that, too, at a time when it might no longer be in their power to engage in other pursuits."

I read yesterday, Mr. President, from a speech of Mr. Webster in 1835. I desire now to read a little more from that same speech in regard to the policy of the exercise of such a power as is claimed for the President:

"The unlimited power to grant office and to take it away gives a command over the hopes and fears of a vast multitude of men. In the main it will be found that power over a man's support is a power over his will. When favors once granted may be withdrawn at pleasure, there is ordinarily little security for personal independence of character."

"The power of giving office thus affects the fears of all who are in and the hopes of all who are out; those who are out endeavor to distinguish themselves by active political friendship, by warm personal devotion, by the clamorous support of men in whose hands is the power of reward, while those who are in take care not to be surpassed in such qualities or conduct as will secure favor."

Again:

"The consequence of this is, that a competition ensues, not of patriotic labors, but of complaisances, of indiscriminate support of executive measures, of pliant subservience, and gross adulation."

"The patronage of office, the power of bestowing place and emoluments, creates parties, not upon any principle or any measure, but upon the single ground of personal interest, and thus they form round a leader and go for the spoils of victory; if the party chieftain becomes the national chieftain, he is apt to consider all who oppose him as enemies to be punished, and all who have supported him as friends to be rewarded."

"Blind devotion to a party and to the head of a party thus takes the place of the sentiment of genuine patriotism and a high and exalted state of public duty."

I desire now to refer to one more authority, and I shall relieve the Senate. I refer to the opinion of Judge Story, in his Commentaries, to justify the legislation that is attempted by this provision offered by the Senator from Illinois. He says, on page 405 of volume two, section 1544:

"Whether the predictions of the original advocates of the executive power or those of the opposers of it are likely, in the future progress of the Government, to be realized, must be left to the sober judgment of the community and to the impartial award of time. If there has been any aberration from the true constitutional exposition of the power of removal (which the reader must decide for himself), it will be difficult, and perhaps impracticable, after forty years' experience, to recall the practice to the correct theory. But at all events, it will be a consolation to those who love the Union and honor the devotion to the patriotic discharge of duty, that in regard to 'inferior officers' (which appellation probably includes ninety-nine out of a hundred of the lucrative offices in the Government) the remedy for any permanent abuse is still within the power of Congress by the simple expedient of requiring the consent of the Senate to removals in such cases."

Mr. President, I have occupied too much of the time of the Senate, but the question is an important one. I know perfectly well that this proposition will be attacked all over the country, and it will be declared that it is an effort on the part of the Senate to curb unconstitutionally the power of the Executive. As I stated yesterday, I have no war to make upon the Executive; I have made no war in this body or elsewhere upon the Executive; but I have felt for many years that if this practice is to go on, whenever a President comes into office, of removing all officers who disagree with him in political opinion, however meritorious they may be, however deserving the confidence of the country; if the public offices are to be given as mere rewards for party fealty and without consideration of merit, it will ultimately lead to a destruction of our Government. I believe this as conscientiously as I believe any fact on earth; and it is not for the purpose so especially of curbing the present Executive as to curb any Executive who may come after him that I favor the amendment. The Senator from Maryland said yesterday that this precedent would return to plague the inventors. I hope so. If the next Executive shall be elected, as the present one was, receiving my vote, I desire that this same curb shall apply to him, and I pledge the Senator from Maryland that if this proposition is adopted no vote of mine, so long as I hold a place here or elsewhere where I can affect the question, will ever be given to confer upon the President an absolute power of removal.

It is clear that we have the power to legislate on this subject. I have shown it from the contemporaneous history of the Government. I have shown it from the opinions of all the leading men of all political parties. I have shown it from the legislation of the country. It was only three sessions ago that we passed an act in regard to the Comptroller of the Currency, that Mr. Lincoln should not remove him without the consent of the Senate. I know it was modified the session afterward, and it now stands that the President must give his reasons for such removal to the Senate, without retaining for ourselves that power which we rightfully hold of preventing the removal entirely. I cannot doubt that we possess this right.

If this assumed power of removal by the President was a dangerous power in days gone by, how much more dangerous has it now become! I disagree with the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maryland that patronage of this character is calculated to weaken the man who holds the power of dispensing it. I think I have shown from the opinions of Judge Story, from the opinions of Mr. Webster, from the opinions of Mr. Calhoun, (which I might read to substantiate the others if it were necessary,) that they believed from circumstances surrounding them at the particular time that it degraded the American character; that it was calculated to make clamorous partisans of the Executive of all men who happened to hold office for fear they might be removed; it took away the independence of those who were in office and made mere slaves and barnacles of those who were out. We see plenty of it now. It is not worth while for us to disguise the fact; we know there is the greatest abundance of it at this day. We know that individuals in office who, judging from their past course, do not at heart agree to the policy of the Executive, have become clamorous advocates of it, and we know also that individuals who are outside have become clamorous advocates of the President's policy for the mere purpose of obtaining office. If any incumbent of any office anywhere in the land stands in opposition to the President's policy; there is somebody ready to take his place, and ready to declare his fealty to the policy of the Administration. Now, I do not pass on that policy, because it does not legitimately come in the purview of my argument. I have nothing to do with it on this occasion. I have attempted to examine this question legally and historically, and I think I have shown beyond all doubt to the unprejudiced mind that the power proposed to be exerted exists in Congress. Now, are we to exercise it or not? That is the question. Are the circumstances of the country such as to induce us to exercise it? I say they are.

I am not afraid to take my position on this subject. I have nothing to ask from the present Executive in the way of patronage; and I can safely express the opinion here that if I had the President would not grant it. I am satisfied from various appointments that have been made in my own State, and from appointments that I understand are to be made in that State, that nothing I could say would have any influence whatever. Gentlemen may say that is the reason why I insist upon this proposition. We have had a bitter contest in the State of Missouri; we have had a bitter contest in this nation; it has been a contest for the life of the nation itself; and if patronage is to be distributed, I for one am frank to say that if it is in my power to prevent its going into the hands of those who, during the last four or five years have advocated a policy antagonistic to my own and antagonistic to the nation, to the existence and salvation of liberty on this continent, I will prevent that.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish gentlemen to misunderstand the position I occupy here. I am frank. I have nothing to ask of anybody; I am indebted to nobody; I feel dependent on nobody; but I desire to see the fruits of the victory we have achieved in this late contest garnered up and kept in the future for the preservation of liberty and of freedom in this nation, and that they shall not turn to ashes upon our lips. I do conscientiously believe that the policy entered upon by the President is well calculated to dash the hopes of the Union men of this nation. I have often said, and I now take occasion to repeat, that it is not my belief that the President intends by his course of policy, whatever it may be, to put under his heels the Union men of this land, and to build up the old rebel party. I have never so said, nor do I now say it; but I say that the effect of his policy is just that thing and nothing else. He has adopted a policy for the restoration of the southern States. Congress claims to have something to do with it; the President thinks not; and he persists in forcing upon us a system of policy to which we object and which we believe will put in power our enemies, not only in this branch, but in the other branch of the Legislature also.

Mr. WILSON. The enemies of the country.
Mr. HENDERSON. When I speak of "our enemies" I mean the enemies of the country. I believe that this course of conduct is well calculated to break down the moral sentiment of the country; and if we in our capacity here can uphold that sentiment it is our duty to do it, and I for one am willing to take the responsibility. I am not willing to violate the Constitution to curb the President. I want to see my way clear; I want to see it perfectly clear; but I am willing to declare now that in every particular in which I can, for the time being, curb that power constitutionally, legally, and in consonance with my own views of right, I will do it. I will do it because I have personal knowledge of some appointments. I will do it because I believe that if this course of policy be persisted in we shall inevitably have further trouble in this country. I do not charge that such is the design of the President. I hope that none such he has. I alluded yesterday to a newspaper article; I have it with me now. We all know that there is a difference between the President and the Senate. It is not worth while to disguise the fact; the country understands it. Measures have been passed by this body and sent to him which he has vetoed, and they have come back; one of them has been passed; the other has been defeated. We know perfectly well that a very strong and powerful party is being organized against the majority in this body. We do not know their future intentions, we do not know their future designs; but we do know that in just such periods as are now upon us, in the past history of other nations much trouble has come. I do not know whether it is the intention to carry out the advice of many papers given to the President in my State and in other States; it is not only in the southern States that this advice is being daily given, but it is in the great West that we find advice of this character given to the President. I hope that nothing like it will be undertaken by him or others who agree or believe with him; but we do not know to what extent this vast power of patronage will urge the President; we do not know what he may attempt; we do not know how confident he may feel in his position; we do not know where this controversy that is now being carried on is to end. I take from a paper of very great influence and large circulation in the West this extract:

"If the disunion majority in Congress persist in their revolutionary measures"—

Several SENATORS. What is the paper?
Mr. HENDERSON. The Illinois State Register, published at Springfield.

"If the disunion majority in Congress persist in their revolutionary measures, let the President take care of them. Capitol prisons and Government battlements have yawned for purer patriots and better men than these incendiaries. Let the leader of the House, Thad. Stevens, and his revolutionists, and the leaders of the Senate, Sumner, Wade, and others of that class, be seized in the Halls they desecrate and be imprisoned. Let the southern members of Congress return to Washington and be duly installed in their seats. Then, on promise of amendment, let those revolutionists out, and the Union will be restored indeed. That day will be an illustrious one for the country, and will make the name of Andrew Johnson truly immortal."

I took up a paper yesterday from New Orleans in which I saw similar advice. The other day I took up a paper from Mobile, Alabama, in which I saw similar advice. I alluded yesterday to language used by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] I regret very much that I should have been the innocent cause of the colloquy that then took place between him and others. I take this occasion to assure the Senator that I was not aware that he had even neglected to publish his remarks made upon a previous occasion. I knew nothing of that, and I did not allude to what he had said for the purpose of criticising the conduct of that Senator in this body or of censuring anything that he may have said or done; but I alluded to it for the purpose of showing that even gentlemen occupying places on this floor entertain this opinion and have expressed it. If this advice were carried out, do you not know that if the southern Senators should come here and organize with the minority of this body, and the southern Representatives should organize with the minority of the other body they would be in the majority? Do you not know perfectly well that if the President has the power to recognize them as the Congress, it will become absolutely essential for him to carry out the advice given in this newspaper extract; that is, to seize the Union majorities of this present body and the other House and put them into bastiles? Do you suppose we should silently submit? Would we any more do it than the Parliament submitted to Charles I?

Sir, if unfortunately a state of affairs of that sort should come upon us, we all know what would be the result: another war, the most terrible ever seen or known in this land, would be upon us. I know what the final result would be. We might have a longer war than we have had; more cities would be burned, more individuals would be killed, more blood would be spilled; there would be desolation in this land not seen or dreamed of during the past war. We know not where the ambition of man will go. I believe that the recent rebellion very largely sprang from this thing of appointments to and removals from office. I believe that when Mr. Buchanan left the Presidency, and Mr. Lincoln came in, the idea of the southern people was that they for all time to come were to be denied the public crib at which they had fed heretofore, and that that belief rushed them into this rebellion. I know they used the slavery question, but they used it as a means of putting themselves in power.

But, sir, I was saying that if a controversy of this sort should come, the issue would be the same that it was between Charles and the Parliament, and the result would be inevitably the same; but it would come after long trouble, after much suffering, after many tribulations. I know that Senators will say it is entirely unnecessary to refer to these things. Mr. President, I tell you, and I tell Senators, that this controversy has gone far enough. I do not say that it is our duty to cease; I do not believe any such thing; but I would gladly to-day, if it were in my power, bring it to an end, as I gladly attempted for many months before the controversy commenced, by all the influence I could bring to bear upon the Executive, to avoid it. I feel that whatever the controversy may lead to in the future, whatever calamities it may bring upon the country, my skirts are clear, and that I did all in my power to prevent it. I would that the course of the Executive had been such as to give the country the real results of our victory.

So far as I am concerned, I have not thought, and I do not now think, that the Congress of the United States has met this controversy as it ought to have done. When the war commenced, it was upon the idea of the inferiority of a race. Mr. Stephens said that our forefathers had built upon a false idea, that all men were equal; and that having built upon the sand, when the storms and the floods came their house fell. It turns out that Mr. Stephens was mistaken, and that the house we occupied was built upon the rock. The idea of the equality of men should be inflexibly adhered to. The question might easily have been settled when the war was over. Slavery was abolished, but slavery was the mere result of an opinion; that opinion was, that there was a difference between men, an inferiority which justified one in making himself the guardian of another, and that the patriarchal relation necessarily resulted from this inferiority. When this house fell and when this idea was exploded we ought to have adopted and insisted upon the other idea of the absolute equality of all men, and built our house upon that. But we are not to do it; I am perfectly aware of that; I know it will not be done.

We shall fail in that endeavor, at least for the present; but then how much have you changed the whole negro question; once it was slavery and anti-slavery; the negro was made use of merely for party power. Now the negro is free, to be sure, physically free; but we are to have the contest over again as to whether he shall be free really. You have merely changed the form of the controversy, and for years and years it will go on as to whether four or five million people in this country, paying taxes, supporting the Government, bearing arms in defense of your country in the great war that we are to have with Austria and other nations of the world, referred to by my friend from Maryland yesterday, are to have any rights at all in the Government. The policy of the Executive is, of course, that they shall have none. That is the controversy really. Hence your Freedmen's Bureau bill was an effort on the part of Congress to give them the rights that were about to be taken away from them; hence your civil rights bill, which was to give them those rights of life, liberty, and property, which were denied to them by the legislation of the southern States. Both of these bills were vetoed. My idea has been that we needed no civil rights bill, though I voted for it; that we needed no Freedmen's Bureau bill, although I voted for it; but that we could attain the object of both and reach it much better by giving them the rights that belong to every man who assisted in upholding and supporting the Government. That has been my view. I may be mistaken, but I entertain it sufficiently strong to say that if the President will continue to carry out an antagonistic policy, denying to them the rights of life, liberty, and property, denying to them that generosity and kindness which we are willing to extend to them; if the President be unwilling under any circumstances to extend to them the right hereafter to participate in government, which we are told must always rest upon the consent of the governed in order to be truly republican; if he will persist in that course of policy, I think it will justify us taking all legal and constitutional means to restrain his power.

But, Mr. President, I have said enough. I have frankly stated what my views are. I have no concealments to make. Others may seek to conceal their purposes; I do not. I want to be justified first by the Constitution; I want to be justified by laws that stand upon a sound constitutional basis; and when I have done that I would restrain this power, because I believe that it is degrading to the country; because I believe that under Administrations to come after us much harm may accrue to civil liberty in this country unless we pluck out this corrupting and baneful influence in the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rise with no view to discuss the policy of the President of the United States, or to contrast that with what is supposed to be the policy of those who differ from him and who constitute the majority of Congress. I have but a word to say in relation to the first, and that is that if I understand what his policy is in the particular referred to, it is that which was adopted and carried out to a certain extent up to the period of his decease by his immediate predecessor. But however that may be, it has nothing to do, as I think, with due submission to my friend who has just taken his seat, with the question which is now submitted for the judgment and decision of the Senate. That question is one of constitutional law, and it should not be influenced, whatever may be the fact, by any political considerations except such as grow out of the nature of the Government constituted by the Constitution. We ought to ascertain what the Constitution is with reference to the subject before us, and to stand by it, no matter what its effects may be upon the party political destinies of the country.

The question is whether, under the Constitution, the President has the power to remove officers without the consent of the Senate; and the question, as it is presented by the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Illinois, comprehends every class of officers whom he may appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate. It embraces, consequently the members of his Cabinet who are called around him for the very purpose of aiding him in the administration of his office, in whom he is to confide, in whose sincerity of friendship, political as well as personal, he ought to rely; and if the Senators will look to what was said in both Houses of Congress at the period when the several Departments were organized, they will see that it never entered into the imagination of any of the statesmen of that day that the President could be compelled to retain in his Cabinet officers in whom he had ceased to confide, no matter upon what ground his confidence was lost. If he suspected a want of integrity, without having any positive proof, nobody doubted that it would be not only his right but his duty to remove. If he suspected or believed a want of fitness, the same was the universal opinion. If he suspected that they were hostile to what he believed to be a proper discharge of his duty, nobody questioned that he would have a right to dispense with them and to get around him men who would, with himself, be a unit with reference to all the executive functions intrusted to that department of Government. But if you adopt this amendment as it is now altered by my friend from Illinois, you to a certain extent deny to him the right to remove a Cabinet officer, because the amendment as it now stands provides that if he does remove he must at the next session of the Senate report to the Senate the reasons upon which he removes. What is to be the effect of that, provided you have the authority to impose it? Suppose the reasons are not satisfactory, is the Cabinet member who has been removed to be reinstated? The amendment does not say so; and if it did say so, what would be the principle which the Senate would have adopted? That of forcing upon the President of the United States a Cabinet officer in whom he has no confidence, whom he believes to be untrue to duty, incompetent to the discharge of his office. The Senate may think differently from the President; they may believe that he has been true to duty, that he has every competency necessary to the discharge of the duties of the office, and so decide; is that to reinstate the minister who has been removed? This amendment does not say so. If it does not say so, what is to be the effect of the amendment? To get before the Senate some ground upon which the other branch of Congress may impeach the President of the United States.

Now, I speak knowingly, Mr. President, when I say that whatever doubt was expressed during the session of the Congress of 1789 in relation to the incidental power of the President to remove, no member of that body (and many of them had been members of the Convention by whom the Constitution was framed) ever suggested that the President could be compelled to keep around him any Cabinet officer whom he desired to displace. Let gentlemen reflect for a moment. We are not legislating now for an hour. Whatever may be the supposed exigency of the time, growing out of any actual or supposed difference of opinion between the President and Congress, what we do now—

"Will be recorded for a precedent:

And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state."

We are but the creatures of an hour. This nation, I trust, is to last as long as anything human continues, ever growing in prosperity and power; and yet the principle included within this amendment strikes a vital blow at the executive department, and is inconsistent with all the objects which it was the purpose of the Convention to have accomplished through the instrumentality of that department. The Senate are not to be told that the second article of the Constitution of the United States, by which that department of the Government is created, says that "the executive power shall be vested in a President;" nor are they to be told that in the celebrated controversy between Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton in relation to the proclamation of neutrality, in letters written over the signatures of "Pacificus" and "Helvetius," Mr. Hamilton took the ground that every power, executive in its nature, except so far as it was restrained by the Constitution, was by force of the terms by which the executive department of the Government was created invested in the President. In the debate in 1789, to which my friend referred, Mr. Madison expressed the opinion with such a positive conviction of its correctness that from that time it has been practically acquiesced in. A part of the discussion in which Mr. Madison participated at that time the honorable member from Missouri has not read. Let me call the attention of the Senate to it for a moment. Mr. Madison in that debate used this explicit language:

"I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him in a peculiar manner responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States or neglects to superintend their conduct so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt."

Now, let me stop for a moment to inquire, if there was no such power of removal what would be the condition of the country and what would be the condition of the President? He is sworn to see to the faithful execution of the laws; and how can he do it? Not personally; it can only be done through the instrumentality of subordinate officers named in the Constitution, or officers appointed under the authority conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. He finds that the laws are not being executed, that an incumbent disregards his duty, is guilty of excesses, is dishonest, is appropriating the public money to his own purposes; what is he to do? He cannot execute the laws except by means of officers; he cannot go into the country himself and collect the revenue; he cannot be at every custom-house in the country and see to the collection of imposts; he cannot go himself personally throughout the country and collect the internal tax, whatever that may be; he cannot execute the judgments of the courts; he cannot go with your Indian agents and see that they properly apply the money set aside by Congress for that purpose. He is obliged to do it through the instrumentality of subordinates, and he finds that they are faithless; what is he to do? You adjourn on the 4th of March; you cannot sit longer at the second session; you do not meet again until December. According to this amendment, although he may turn out, (for the amendment does not deny that,) he cannot supply the places of those who may be dismissed; or unless he can find anybody disposed to take the place upon the contingency that the Senate will thereafter approve of the appointment, the place is not to be filled.

Well, then, your imposts are not collected; your tax remains in the hands of those who are liable to pay it; the duties which you owe to the Indians and the execution of your treaties with them remain unperformed. The Government, in a word, comes to a stand-still; and my honorable friend from Missouri thinks it would be pregnant with great public mischief to give to a President of the United States, elected by a majority of the people of the United States, a power of removal because he may abuse it. Certainly he may. Cannot we abuse our power? Are we individually better than he is? I do not speak of the present members of the Senate or of the House of Representatives or of the present incumbent of the presidential office; but looking into the manner in which they are respectively elected, is it a bit more probable that the President of the United States will be corrupt or prejudiced, almost to the point of practical corruption, than it is that some members of Congress may be corrupt; or to put a more respectable supposition, is it probable that they will be more enlightened and more able to see the true interests of the country than the President of the United States? I think not.

As far as my knowledge extends, nobody has ever impeached the personal integrity of any President of the United States. As to that, each has been spotless in the public estimation. Errors of judgment have been imputed to them; imbecility was imputed to him who preceded President Lincoln; that is to say, an imbecility which unsuited him for the exigencies in which he was placed; but in point of personal integrity his character never was assailed. Members of the Senate have been charged with improper conduct, and have been expelled; members of the House of Representatives have been charged with improper conduct, and have been expelled. So then in point of fact, looking to the experience of the country, it is just as likely that misconduct may be found in the Halls of Congress as that it may be found in the executive chamber.

But what is to supply the evil consequent upon the inability of the President to execute the laws because the officers placed under his charge are not fit, either morally or intellectually, to execute the laws? Above all, when you charge him, as a Congress would have the right to charge him; when the judgment of the country would charge him with having abandoned his duty in seeing the laws faithfully executed, and he comes before you and defends himself upon the ground that his officers were incompetent, you would, at one time, and every Senate will hereafter, if that should be the ground of impeachment, tell him in reply, "It was your duty to remove the incompetent."

I know that when the question was first presented, in 1789, there were differences of opinion, and I know that it was decided in favor of what has been the practice ever since by the casting vote of the Presiding Officer in this body, but it received a majority of more than twenty in the House of Representatives. And see what Chancellor Kent says upon the subject. He seems to have doubted it as an original question; but after citing the preamble of the act of 1789, establishing the Treasury Department, which declared "that whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States," thus assuming the power to remove, the commentator says:

"This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it."—Kent's Commentaries, part 2, vol. 1, p. 310.

My friend from Missouri seems to suppose that he has found in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, and in a subsequent case that he cited from Peters, decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States at war with that principle. He entirely—I speak it respectfully—misapprehends both cases. The Constitution of the United States provides for certain officers by name; it gives to the President of the United States the authority, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint to offices of that description. It vests in Congress the authority to give the power of appointment of other and inferior officers to any other department of the Government that it may think proper; and as Mr. Justice Story says, in the passages referred to by the honorable member from Missouri, under the latter authority nearly all the evils supposed to be incidental to the sweeping power of the President to remove may be guarded against, because Congress, under the power of providing for the appointment of inferior officers, have a right to provide for the term of office, and to make the particular officer independent of the Executive.

And now, what did Marbury vs. Madison decide? Mr. Adams, just at the close of his administration, appointed a number of magistrates here in this District, and he appointed a good many judges under a law passed about the same time constituting additional circuits of the United States, and making the Supreme Court of the United States exclusively an appellate tribunal. Before Mr. Adams went out of office his nomination of Marbury had been confirmed by the Senate, sent to the President, and a commission issued which he signed and which was deposited in the archives of the State Department, but was not delivered. The Supreme Court of the United States, upon an application made by Marbury for a mandamus to compel the Secretary of State, not the President, to deliver the commission, decided the question of the right of Marbury to the commission. With due deference to the very distinguished man then at the head of that court, and to those who were associated with him, I must be permitted to say that in doing so they committed, in my judgment, a very grave fault. They committed the same fault which the Supreme Court afterward in the Dred Scott case is supposed to have committed. They committed the fault of deciding a controversy in a case which was not before them, because after a labored and an able argument, as every argument flowing from the pen of that great man ever was, they came to the conclusion at the end of the opinion that the whole matter was coram non jure, that the act of 1789 which gave an authority to issue the writ of mandamus was to be construed in connection with the Constitution of the United States, and in such a case as was before them Congress had not power to clothe the court with the authority to issue the writ except in cases in which they had an appellate jurisdiction. Their original jurisdiction being of a limited character and that not including such a case as Marbury presented, Congress had no authority, as they said, to give to the Supreme Court of the United States the power to issue the writ, and they dismissed the application and it has ever been a subject of regret that principles should have been announced in that opinion upon the merits of the controversy which, as the result showed, in the opinion of the court were not before them. The court fell into the great error of assuming jurisdiction so far as to decide a controversy which they afterward held in the same opinion was not before them because of the want of jurisdiction; and the Supreme Court in the subsequent case of Dred Scott, in the opinion of some, was thought to have fallen into the same error, and that in part has led to the severe animadversions upon that adjudication.

But, Mr. President, suppose it was before them, and suppose that opinion to be esteemed as authority, what does it decide? That Congress having created the office of magistrate, an office not known to the Constitution, and under their power to create having provided that the term of service of the incumbent should be five years, the incumbent was not liable to be removed until the expiration of that period, never denying—I think I speak knowingly; Heaven knows I have had occasion to read the judgment often enough—never denying the existence of the power decided in 1789 to exist in the President of removing officers generally; and the same remark is applicable to the case which my friend has cited from the thirteenth volume of Peters.

But if the honorable member had pushed his researches further he would have found another decision; and if he was at the bar, and we were trying a case, I should rather think it was because he found something in it against his argument.

Mr. HENDERSON. I referred to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The case to which I allude was this: the Supreme Court having decided in the case of Canter vs. The American Insurance Company, reported in 1 Peters, that territorial judges were not constitutional judges, and therefore were not judges to hold their office during good behavior, but could be removed by the President at any time, Mr. Fillmore removed one or two; and one of those judges applied for a mandamus to compel the payment of his salary upon the ground that the President had no authority to remove him, and of course that his successor was improperly put in office. The Senate of the United States, the power to appoint in a case of that description being a power to be exerted in conjunction with the Senate of the United States, had approved the nomination.

Mr. HOWE. The subsequent nomination. Mr. JOHNSON. The subsequent nomination; but the question came before the Supreme Court, did that remove from office the original incumbent? That raised the question whether the President had power to remove; and as well as I recollect—I have not got the book by me—there was no member of the bench that suggested a doubt that as the Constitution was, in the judgment of that tribunal the power to remove was vested in the President, and pretty much for the reasons given by Chancellor Kent. If the Constitution had not provided that the appointment should be made in conjunction with the Senate, if it had merely created the office and created the executive department, the power to appoint would have been vested in the President, because in its nature it was an executive power, and therefore the provision of the Constitution which required the appointment to be made in conjunction with the Senate was an exception from what would otherwise be the power of the President; and as the power of appointment in that view of it would have been an executive power, not requiring the advice and consent of the Senate, the power to remove, which was not provided for in the Constitution, was a power resting in the President because that also was an executive power.

My learned friend—and that, as I think, if there be an error in the argument, is the ground of the error—says there is nothing in the Constitution which gives to the President the power to remove. Certainly not; nor is there anything in the Constitution which gives to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power to remove. There are no such words to be found in the instrument. The power to remove, if it is to be exerted by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is a power incidental to the power to appoint, and can only be placed upon that ground. The Convention did not think it necessary to provide an express power by which an incompetent officer was to be removed. They left it to be inferred; and Mr. Madison and those who coincided with him (and the Government has been conducted ever since upon the hypothesis of the correctness of that decision) considered the power to remove as an executive power, not dependent upon the power to appoint with the consent of the Senate, because that looked to one object and the other looked to a different object. The one looked to the power to fill an office; the other looked to the power to remove an incompetent incumbent.

I have not time, nor would I fatigue the Senate if I had, by referring to Story for the purpose of showing that he coincides with the view of Chancellor Kent. As an original question he doubted the existence of the power, not upon the ground of its supposed corrupt or dangerous tendency, as it was questioned by a good many respectable and able men, but he came to the conclusion, in the words I have already read to the Senate, that it is incidental to the executive function, and is necessary to enable the Executive to discharge his duty of providing for the faithful execution of the laws.

Now, Mr. President, whatever may be the opinion of the Senate on this question, I submit to my friend from Missouri, and those who concur with him on the question of power, whether it is advisable to put the proposition in this appropriation bill. I do not know what view the President will entertain upon the question. I know what Andrew Jackson would have thought of it and how he would have acted. He would have considered it a direct infringement upon his constitutional rights, and he would have vetoed the bill. Now, suppose the President comes to that determination, and you are unable to override that veto of an appropriation bill, the whole appropriation will be lost. We lost an appropriation bill here at the last session, and a very important one, the miscellaneous appropriation bill, because there was tacked to it a provision that was offensive to the then President of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. It failed in conference.

Mr. JOHNSON. It failed in conference finally, but it was understood to be very distasteful to the then President and very distasteful to a great many members of this body, and the bill failed. Now, let me ask the Senate, as statesmen, as sensible and unprejudiced men—and I certainly assume that that is the case with all whom I address—where is the necessity of incumbering this bill with a measure which may be provided for in a distinct bill just as operative to effect its purpose, if it can be passed, and without subjecting the particular bill, an appropriation bill as important as this, to the delay, and perhaps to the defeat, which may be the result of incumbering it with a provision of this description? Suppose your post offices are stopped. You know as much of the President's purpose as I do; but suppose he comes to the conclusion that you have no right to interfere with what he believes to be his constitutional power, and the bill is lost, what will be the issue before the country? The post offices all to be closed, the mails arrested, communication between the several sections of the country put a stop to. You will say it is the President's fault; but what will the President say? "I stood upon the ground assumed by Madison in 1789 and never afterward departed from; questioned once or twice, but no measure ever proposed to change the question of power." Do you not think that the people will concur with the President, that the fault is with us? If you should reply, when you are called to account for having closed the post offices, that you were compelled to do it, the answer that could be and would be given to you would be considered as a triumphant answer, "Where was the necessity of clogging an appropriation bill with a measure of that description? Why did you not put it in a separate bill and let the issue go before the country whether you were right or wrong, if the President thought proper not to sanction that bill?"

I have no particular desire, provided there be a difference of opinion between Congress and the President of the United States, to render aid and comfort to Congress just at this particular juncture; but I tell them, and I tell them in all sincerity, that I think I am giving aid and comfort to them when I appeal to them not to incumber this bill with a provision of this description. They will give to the President a power before the country that he does not now possess, provided you can carry it through both branches, and provided he vetoes the bill, and the bill shall be lost on that account.

As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the differences, whatever they may be, existing now between the President of the United States and Congress. I am willing, more than willing, to admit that if there be such differences, each of the parties to the difference thinks that he is right; but I think I may say—I know I may say—that those who differ from the President ought charitably to conclude that he just as firmly believes that he is right as they believe that the contrary policy which they pursue is right. There is an honest difference of opinion, if there be any difference of opinion, and it is material to the interests of the country, in my judgment, that that honest difference of opinion shall be healed as speedily as possible. Let it break out as is suggested by the member from Missouri, speaking upon the authority of some Illinois paper; let it be carried to the extremity recommended by that paper, and what will be our fate? God forbid that it should come to that result; but the mere threat of such a result is calculated to weaken the Government in the estimation of our own people and in the estimation of the world at large; to break down the credit which we want in support of our finances; to unsettle that which I had hoped the triumph of our arms had achieved; to bring about not a restored Union, but a Union more distracted and a Government in infinitely more peril than it was during the worst period of the civil strife out of which, as far as arms could accomplish it, we have so gloriously emerged.

Mr. WILSON. We have some very important business to transact in executive session, and after consulting one or two Senators, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will dispose of this bill to-day. We have been engaged now for three days on a collateral question on an appropriation bill. If the motion is insisted upon, I shall call for the yeas and nays upon it. If the majority of the Senate really desire to prolong this controversy, I should like to be informed of it, so that I may act accordingly. In order to test the sense of the Senate, I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that if we proceed with its consideration we can dispose of this bill in a few minutes, but if it goes over until to-morrow it will take another day.

Mr. WILSON. With the consent of the Senate I will withdraw the motion; but I supposed, on consultation with several gentlemen, some of whom now advise the other way, that it was the general desire that we go into executive session in order to give time to look into this question a little more carefully. I have no doubt it would be better to do so; but at the same time I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest feeling about the matter. If the majority of the Senate think that the bill had better go over until to-morrow, I have no objection; but I think we ought to finish it to-day and be done with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion can be withdrawn by unanimous consent only, the yeas and nays having been ordered. The Chair hears no objection. The motion is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe there has been a material change made in that amendment this morning, and therefore I ask for its reading.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate, and since its last adjournment by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office; the cause, in case of removal, to be reported to the Senate at its next session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois stood yesterday, I should have very readily voted for it. I did not think it worth while to go into any argument on the subject. The constitutional right is very clear, so far as the appropriation of money is concerned. We can make any rules in reference to that that we please. The last clause, however, which is now introduced by the amendment this morning is very objectionable to me, and I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I preferred the amendment as it stood yesterday myself, but several Senators around me insisted upon having in it a provision in regard to removals; and I put it in at their suggestion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As it stands now I cannot vote for it with that clause in it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Maine will now agree with me in the suggestion that I made the other day, that this matter might be put on some other appropriation bill just as well. We have at least seven or eight appropriation bills; this is the first; and it is scarcely worth while, when there is so much difference among ourselves in regard to the phraseology of this provision, to put it on this bill. I hope, therefore, it may be withdrawn from this bill, and if it is necessary at all, let it be put on some other bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So far as that is concerned, I cannot control or would not undertake to control the action of the gentlemen who have moved it as an amendment to this bill. I do not see anything very inappropriate about it, if they choose to move it, because it has reference to the expenditure of the money and may very properly be here, if gentlemen insist on keeping it here. But the proposition as it stands now has a look that is disagreeable to me.

Mr. HENDERSON. It admits the power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to this last clause requiring the President in case of removals to give his reasons to the Senate. I do not think we have a right to require that. If the President, in the exercise of this power chooses to remove persons, we have a right to say that those appointed in their places shall not be paid until the Senate has chosen to act upon their nominations; but to put the President to the necessity in all cases of telling the Senate, if he nominates another person for an office, the reason why he does it, is a new thing. Such a proposition was offered once in the time of General Taylor by my immediate predecessor. He brought it up over and over again in a very strongly Democratic Senate. I do not remember whether they finally voted it down or not, but if not, they got rid of it; they would not pass it at any rate, holding to the doctrine that the President, having the power of removal, so long as he had it he must exercise his own discretion about that, and that with reference to his appointments the Senate would consider whether they were proper appointments to be made.

I see no impropriety whatever in saying that when appointments are made during the recess, especially those which might as well be made to the Senate when it is in session, payment to those appointees shall be deferred until they have been confirmed. I do not think there is anything personal or offensive in making that rule. The doctrine which has been broached lately, and a matter conversed about under the administration of President Lincoln, was carried as far as this: that the President might nominate an officer during the recess of the Senate, which would hold up to the conclusion of the next session, and if then he was rejected or turned out, or at least not acted upon, it was again a vacancy arising in the recess of Congress, and the President might immediately put the same man in that the Senate had refused to confirm; and thus, in spite of the Senate, in spite of the constitutional provision, the power of appointment would rest entirely in the President, and the Senate was a nullity. I do not know and do not presume that President Johnson would attempt to do anything of that description. It is to be presumed he would not; but President Lincoln did, certainly in one case. I thought at the time it was exceedingly improper, and if the doctrine was followed out and the practice became fixed, that in reality the Senate would amount to just nothing at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is grossly improper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly. That was in the case of a judge appointed in this District. The Senate refused to confirm him, once rejected him; it was then reconsidered, and the matter went to the last day of the session and he was not confirmed, and immediately after the adjournment of the Senate he was reappointed by President Lincoln, and he was afterward confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was Wylic's case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted against him finally, and I would vote against any man simply on that ground: that it is an encroachment upon the rights of the Senate, and if acceded to and followed the result is inevitable that the Senate is no part of the appointing power which the Constitution makes it. It was done in another case, and a more gross case, in my judgment, and that was in the case of General Blair, who had resigned his command and had been sworn as a member of the other House; his resignation had been accepted; and after the Senate had adjourned, I believe, the President undertook to put him in command of a corps of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON, and others. It was during the session of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. While we were in session; and the Senate and the House of Representatives, by almost unanimous votes, reproved the President in fact for doing so. I remember that I remarked at the time, or shortly after, when I went into the Treasury Department, that if it was in my power to do it—which it was not, because I had no control over it—he never should have been paid a dollar for the services rendered by him, because I thought his appointment was in gross violation of the Constitution.

Now, sir, when such things are done and when such doctrines are advanced and claimed, I think, without any impropriety whatever, Congress may assert their right over the money of the country, which they have unquestionable power to do, without infringing upon the right of anybody, and say, that where things are done contrary to the usual course, done by whom they may, they will hold on to the money until the Senate has had an opportunity to judge in such cases. It is an imputation upon nobody. I do not presume that President Johnson would do such a thing, or that he will take any offense at a provision of this kind.

That the President has the power of removal from office I have never doubted, for the simple reason that it seems to me to arise from the necessity of the case; that in the recess of Congress it may happen, and has happened, that a man may be guilty of such offenses that his removal at once becomes absolutely necessary; and in that case certainly the President should exercise the power; and in that case, or in any similar case, for any good reason; in any case, in fact, which did not upon its face present a gross dereliction of duty and a violation of the principles of the Constitution, Congress would not hesitate to pay the money to the officer appointed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then let me ask the Senator, why refuse to pay the man? If the President can constitutionally remove an officer and then make an appointment, of course the Constitution gives him a perfect right to fill the vacancy until the last day of the next session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would not refuse to pay him. I would, whenever the case came before me, vote to pay him; but I say that in view of the principle that has been acted upon in some cases, and avowed by gentlemen as a correct principle, that the President can appoint during the recess, and when Congress adjourns, the Senate having rejected that man, can appoint the same man over again, it is necessary that we should express our opinion on such a power. I would have done it before if I had had an opportunity to do it, and therefore, as I would have always acted upon it, I am perfectly willing to act upon it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the amendment were confined to that class of cases it would be all very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot tell whether it is one of that sort until the question comes up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Take the case of a Cabinet minister, or a more exaggerated and harder case than that, the case of an internal revenue officer, who is compelled to pay the deputies out of the fees; and would you require him to act until the close of the next session without receiving any pay?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think there need be cases of that description, because the first assistant of the collector or assessor who was removed would discharge the duties until the appointment was made.

Mr. SHERMAN. He cannot use a dollar of the money. The money is all paid into the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see that any very great inconvenience would arise. At any rate I do not feel disposed to argue that point. I have long felt that with reference to appointments the power was tending too much in the direction of nullifying entirely the action of the Senate, and that it was time we should assert our own power over the question in some practical way, and I know no way so practical as this. I had therefore made up my mind to vote for the amendment if it was presented, although I would rather have it in some other place than on this bill; but of that I do not assume to judge. But with regard to the last clause of the amendment as it now stands, that the President when he exercises the power of removal shall in all cases be bound to give his reasons to the Senate, I think it is offensive in its very nature and character, and I cannot consent to vote for it if it stands in that way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In my desire to accommodate our friends I changed the amendment from what it was yesterday, more perhaps in consequence of what was said by the Senator from Ohio than any one else. Several Senators around me thought it was better to obviate an objection that he presented, that a person might be guilty of malfeasance in office, and it would be very hard if, under such circumstances, when he was turned out, and his successor appointed, a good man, he could not be paid until he was confirmed. The Senator from Ohio suggested that he might die after discharging the duties of the office for months, and in that way be entirely without pay. I was disposed, so long as we could get at the object which I had in view, to accommodate the amendment as far as possible to the wishes of all, and hence I modified the amendment this morning. Now, it seems that in endeavoring to avoid Charybdis I have run upon Scylla, and the Senator from Maine says he cannot go for it as it is. If it is more acceptable to Senators to have it in the form in which it stood yesterday, it is certainly more acceptable to me in that form. That was my preference. I changed it at the suggestion of several Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have the yeas and nays been called for?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. We had better vote, then.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There seems to be a disposition to pass upon it to-day in the shape in which we had it yesterday. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as it was proposed yesterday.

The Secretary read as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall before confirmation by the Senate receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the recess of the Senate, and since its last adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. That does not provide for the case of a removal?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then if the President should find out that an officer is dishonest and remove him, and appoint a successor on the 5th of March, at the end of the Congress, that officer is not to get any pay until the next December. The question is, whether that is right? It may be a Cabinet officer or a collector of the revenue. I do not think the Senate, when they come to reflect upon it, will adopt a principle like that.

Mr. GRIMES. You will get plenty of men to take the offices.

Mr. JOHNSON. What sort of men?

Mr. GRIMES. Good men.

Mr. JOHNSON. Men from Iowa, perhaps.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, and from Maryland.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment until I can make a request of the Senator from Illinois. I hope that the Senator from Illinois will withdraw this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion?

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not like to do so. I am satisfied that the Senate are not prepared to vote on the question before them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to make one remark.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will you renew the motion?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEY. With that understanding I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. The proposition presented yesterday by the Senator from Illinois I like much better than the proposition presented to-day. The proposition as made to-day admits the power of the President to remove. I do not admit it.

The Senator from Maryland, in replying to me a short time ago, alluded to a case reported in 18 Howard, in which he stated that the court had decided that President Fillmore had a right to remove a judge of a Territory appointed under an act of Congress. I sent for a copy of the book. I stated in my argument that the case did not contravene the other two cases relied upon by me; and if he will examine the case he will find that although that question was argued before the court, there was no decision made on it. I undertake to say that the power to remove by the President without the consent of the Senate has never been passed upon favorably by the Supreme Court. I have been unable to find such a case, and I am satisfied the case my friend relied upon does not support his views, because the court followed the doctrine that he regretted had not been followed in the other cases; they said that point was not before them. They merely decided that the writ of mandamus could not go because of their want of jurisdiction in the case. Therefore, the other point was not decided, and my friend will have to find some other case in order to sustain his view.

As I stated yesterday, I am preparing a bill on this subject. I think that an act of Congress ought to be passed placing this power in the hands of somebody, in one of the supreme judges or in the President, to remove an officer in the cases alluded to by the honorable Senator from Maryland. But if the Senator from Illinois insists upon his proposition, I shall vote for it as it now stands, because it does curtail the power to a certain extent. But I think the power of appointment ought to be denied positively to the President in the vacation; that is, the power of removing and then declaring that a vacancy exists which he can fill. So far as I am concerned, I am disposed to deny that power absolutely unless it be granted in extraordinary cases by act of Congress. Whenever an officer is appointed, and there is no limitation or duration fixed to the extent of his office, and there is no power expressly given by act of Congress for his removal, I deny the power of the President to remove him. I say the authority is perfectly abundant on that subject.

I promised my friend from Minnesota to renew the motion to go into executive session. He held me under some obligation to do it, and does yet, and I therefore renew the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply desire to get the sense of the Senate, and therefore I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I have no feeling about it. If the Senate desire to prolong this matter until to-morrow they can do so; but I want to close it to-day.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wilson, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, and Wiley—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Cresswell, Edmunds, Foster, Hendricks, Kirkwood, McDougall, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, Williams, and Wright—14.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, gave notice that he would propose to amend the "bill to provide for the restoration of the States in insurrection to their full practical rights," by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That whenever the above recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution, and Tennessee or Arkansas shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, and shall have established an equal and just system of suffrage for all male citizens within its jurisdiction, who are not less than twenty-one years of age, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oath of office, be admitted into Congress as usual: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to require the disfranchisement of any loyal person who is now entitled to vote.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I give notice of my intention to offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have printed.

The proposed amendment was accordingly ordered to be printed.

TAX ON CRUDE PETROLEUM.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked leave to introduce a joint resolution to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal revenue tax or duty, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The Committee of Ways and Means have unanimously recommended this joint resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I am not in favor of the proposition at all, and am not willing it should come in.

RESOLUTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. DAWES submitted a resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts on the state of the Union and the duties of the Government to the freedmen; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MARY A. RIPLEY.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Mary A. Ripley; which was read a first and second time, and referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROSS. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I object.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the regular order.

CUSTOM-HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 75, making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates $2,100,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. STEVENS. I simply want to say that the law of 1858, precisely in the words of this, has been acted upon ever since that time, being the permanent law; and that the large increase in the expense of collecting the revenue, being $300,000 more than it was, makes this necessary. It is an increase from $1,800,000 to $2,100,000. It reenacts the old law; or, rather, repeals it, and makes one precisely like it, with the addition of $300,000 a year, which is found necessary. That is the whole of the bill.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of the memorials of P. E. Saunders, and others, inspectors of customs in Detroit, Michigan, asking for increase of pay; also, the memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking an appropriation for improving the harbors of Lake Superior; and the same were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DESTITUTE PEOPLE IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution for reference:

Whereas it is represented, on civil and military authority and by official reports to the Freedmen's

Bureau, that an alarming condition of destitution among the white population and freedmen, extending to absolute want of food, exists in various portions of the South, and especially in Arkansas, Alabama, and South Carolina, and that without Government aid thousands may perish by starvation before the raising of another crop. Therefore,

Resolved, That the select committee on the freedmen inquire into the expediency of an appropriation of $100,000 for the immediate relief by rations of food to those thus destitute, giving preference in such relief to those whose personal property and supplies of food have been destroyed by the ravages of war, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands; and that the said committee have the right to report on such subject for consideration in the House at any time.

Mr. STEVENS. I merely wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts the necessity of this resolution. Yesterday the Committee on Appropriations reported a bill appropriating about eleven million dollars for this very purpose, and that bill is to be considered to-day in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELIOT. That appropriation is not for this purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. It is for the purposes of the bureau.

Mr. ELIOT. This is rather more extended than that.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I have not the least objection.

Mr. ELIOT. This resolution is only for reference to the committee on freedmen's affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought perhaps the gentleman was not aware that the Committee on Appropriations had reported on this subject.

Mr. ELIOT. Oh, yes, I was.

Mr. STEVENS. That is all.

The resolution was referred to the committee on freedmen's affairs.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask leave to report back, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, House bill No. 197, to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments. The committee recommend a concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

There was no objection; and the report was received, and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in, as follows:

On page 1, line seven, after the word "paymasters," insert "and all passed assistant paymasters authorized by this act to be appointed who have not heretofore been appointed and commissioned as assistant paymasters, and all assistant paymasters hereby authorized to be appointed, shall be selected from those who have served as acting assistant paymasters for the term of one year, and who were eligible to appointment to the grade of assistant paymasters when they were appointed assistant paymasters as aforesaid."

On the same page and line, after the word "subject," insert "however."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McRUER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ROSS. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair must arrest all other business but the regular order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will hear what he is objecting to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer a resolution to carry into operation the provisions of the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] demands the regular order of business.

Mr. ROSS. I desired to offer a resolution a short time ago and objection was made, and I must therefore insist on the regular order.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of House bill No. 481, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage immigration,' approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels,' approved March 3, 1865, and for other purposes."

The bill was reported without amendment, the pending question being upon ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce, and with the report accompanying it has been printed for some time, and placed upon the files of members. It is a pretty broad bill in its provisions, and I desire members to examine it closely, as it may be broader than some members may be willing to agree to. But the committee believe that in consequence of the vast immigration to this country at the present time, and the character of the vessels in which these immigrants are brought to this country, it is important that something should be done immediately in this matter.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the last clause of the section in relation to the enforcement of penalties, being section four of the bill, so that it shall read:

It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Immigration, before or after suit brought, to compound any of said penalties, payments, or forfeitures, upon such terms as he shall think proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is one section printed in this bill which has been inserted by mistake—section eight. I move to strike out the section.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered at the port of New York by virtue of this act, or any act hereby amended, except for death of passengers on voyage, shall be paid over to the superintendent of immigration at that city, to be accounted for by him to the Commissioner of Immigration, and disposed of by the latter as now provided by law.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If no one desires to be heard upon the bill I will ask that the House vote upon it now.

Mr. DARLING. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will not call the previous question upon this bill at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no desire to call the previous question now if gentlemen desire to discuss the bill. This measure is no pet of mine; it is for the benefit of the constituents of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DARLING.] If he desires to kill the bill, he may do so.

Mr. DARLING. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] as to the importance of this bill, particularly in relation to the port of New York and other ports of the Atlantic coast. But I had the honor, on the 29th of January, of introducing a bill amending the present passenger law in regard to the carrying of passengers. That bill, I understand, has been submitted by the committee to the Secretary of the Treasury and has met with his approval. If it is to be reported to the House by the committee, I shall not object to some alterations being made in it. Otherwise I should like to have incorporated in this bill the first section of the bill introduced by me, which covers pretty much all the defective points in the present passenger law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DARLING,] that the bill he has introduced is being considered by the Committee on Commerce, and will undoubtedly be reported upon favorably when that committee is called. There are some very important provisions in it, but they would be out of place in this bill. This bill is in aid of the Bureau of Immigration, and is one of very great importance to the city of New York. I have no particular interest in it myself; but I am somewhat surprised to see my friend disposed to embarrass the passage of this bill.

Mr. DARLING. I wish the gentleman from Illinois to understand that I have no disposition or intention to embarrass the action of the House upon this bill; on the contrary, I very much desire its passage. Section three of this bill substantially embodies a portion of the provisions contained in the bill introduced by me. I only desire to have it understood that the passage of this bill shall not prejudice the passage of my own bill when it shall come before the House.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] if this bill has been recommended by any competent authority.

Mr. DARLING. I have not yet yielded the floor. I desire to move to insert after the words, "Commissioner of Immigration," at the close of section four, the words, "with the approval of the Secretary of State." The clause will then read:

It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of State, before or after suit brought, to compound any of said penalties, payments, or forfeitures, upon such terms as he shall think proper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion; I think the amendment is a very proper one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLING. I move to amend by striking out in the third section the following words, beginning at the word "ship" in the second line:

Owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States or by a citizen of any foreign country, and.

This phraseology is mere surplusage; for who but a citizen of the United States or of a foreign country can own a ship? I suppose the gentleman from Illinois will not object to this amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLING. I move to amend by striking out in the fifth line of the same section the word "fourteen," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve," so that the clause will read as follows:

That in every passenger ship carrying passengers to or from the United States, all the male passengers of the age of twelve years and upward, who shall not occupy berths with their wives, shall be berthed in the fore part of the ship, in a compartment divided off from the space appointed to the other passengers by a substantial and well-secured bulkhead, without opening into or communicating with the aforesaid adjoining space.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give us some information relative to the fourteenth section. It strikes me this section gives a great latitude of power to the naval surveyors, and may operate injuriously with regard to immigration. This power may be exerted in such a way as to interfere improperly with those engaged in the business of bringing immigrants to this country. The gentleman will oblige me by giving some information in regard to the history and necessity of this section. For the purpose of eliciting an explanation I move to strike out the fourteenth section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is one of the most vital sections of the bill. If we strike it out we may as well defeat the whole bill. I could not hear distinctly the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] and do not understand precisely the ground of his objection.

As the law now stands, there are so many abuses in regard to the space which shall be occupied by passengers in these ships, that it is found necessary to authorize by law some specific officer to make the surveys. Hence, by this bill, it is made the duty of the naval surveyors at the various ports to attend to making the surveys. The want of such action and such authority has led to the greatest possible abuses, as the gentleman from New York must thoroughly understand.

Mr. CHANLER. I am fully aware that some provision of this kind is necessary for the regulation of immigrant ships coming to this country. But the power proposed by this section to be given to the surveyor of the port is very great. He will hold in his hands the control of the whole business of immigration. I believe that the bill should contain some efficient provision with reference to the measurement of accommodations given to the immigrants. I desire that those accommodations should be the most comfortable and healthy. My object is not to prevent, but to aid and facilitate immigration. But it appears to me that by putting this immense power in the hands of a single officer we shall not so much facilitate immigration as enable the power of one man to control the whole system. There may be some stringent necessity for giving this extreme and unrestricted power to regulate the whole of the immense immigration into the port of New York. Unless such necessity exists, I think we should provide some system of checks, such as do not now appear in the bill.

I have risen simply to call the attention of the House to this section. I desire to make no opposition to the bill, nor to any proper and beneficent measure having the same object. But this bill has been brought forward with very little explanation. We should not, I think, be called upon to pass on such a measure without fully understanding it. Certainly we are entitled to have full information on this subject.

We are told that the section is vital, and that we might as well vote down the entire bill as to strike out this section. But that is no answer to the demand for information. If the gentleman has no practical information to give, the majority of the House can act under his leadership. My object is not to defeat the bill. I only ask whether the gentleman is able to give a plausible reason why so much power should be given to the naval surveyor as to control immigration across the Atlantic; that, indeed, it should be left entirely and exclusively in the hands of the surveyor of New York.

Mr. DONNELLY. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is to strike out the fourteenth section of the bill. I will say, in answer, that if the motion is adopted it will strike out the vital portion of the pending measure. Without that section the bill would be a nullity.

The bill is intended in the main for the protection of immigrants to this country from being overcrowded, as many of them are, on ship-board. We find when we permit such overcrowding we not only do great injustice to the immigrant, but we incur the danger to the country, as we have already seen, of having a terrible pestilence brought into our ports, and thence spread over the land.

The section provides that every vessel carrying immigrants shall be surveyed so as to ascertain whether overcrowding takes place; and where overcrowding does take place a penalty is imposed. It is the vital portion of the bill.

I think the House and country are indebted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] for pressing through this bill. It is not only a measure of safety for our own people, but of humanity to those whom our laws invite to our shores, who are to become citizens among us, and whose immigration hither should be encouraged by every proper means. We must avoid these "horrors of the middle passage," the recital of which, in the case of the vessels which have lately reached New York and Halifax, freighted with pestilence, revive the memory of the African slave trade.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. If the gentleman demands the previous question, cutting off information, I must insist on my motion to strike out.

Mr. McRUER. I ask to amend the section so that it will read as follows:

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the naval surveyors at the various ports to survey ships and vessels engaged in the carrying of passengers under the laws of the United States, and to certify under their hand and seal to the Commissioner of Immigration the spaces in each such ship or vessel on the various decks, said spaces to be classed as first and second cabin and steerage, and how many passengers the said ship or vessel may be entitled to carry under the laws of the United States in each of said spaces, classed as aforesaid, &c.

Mr. Speaker, my object in this amendment is to provide that a ship entitled to carry one thousand passengers, as follows: one hundred in first cabin, two hundred in second cabin, and seven hundred in steerage, shall not crowd the whole number into the steerage or overcrowd any other portion of a ship.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is not applicable to this, but to another measure which the committee have been considering. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CHANLER's motion was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the select committee on the Provost Marshal's Bureau, &c.: Messrs. SHELLABARGER, WINDOM, BOYER, COOK, and WARNER.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas, reports are freely circulated, and charges made, that recruits were by fraudulent practices induced to enlist in the armies of the United States, in the city of New York and elsewhere, by officers of the Government, and other persons employed by such officers to aid in such fraudulent practices; and whereas it is alleged that such recruits when enlisted were deprived of their bounty and incarcerated in prison, and this bounty divided and shared between such officers and the persons who were employed by them, and also that persons engaged in the business of recruiting for the Army in the city of New York and elsewhere, were also defrauded by such officers and other persons acting in concert with them, and large amounts of money demanded and extorted from them, and that they were imprisoned until such demands were complied with, and were then immediately released; and whereas it is important that the truth of these grave charges should be speedily ascertained: Therefore,

Resolved, That the select committee of five appointed under the resolution of the 30th ultimo, be directed to investigate such charges, and that they have full power to send for persons and papers, and report the results of such investigation to this House as soon as practicable.

STARVING MOUNTAINEERS OF ALABAMA.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution for the relief of the starving people of the mountain districts of Alabama:

Whereas it is reported by citizens of Alabama, in formal memorial to the two Houses of Congress, that many of the people of the mountain districts of that State are suffering from want of adequate supplies of food and that a considerable number of them have died of actual starvation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to instruct the proper officer or officers of the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen to inquire into the condition of said districts, and any other districts of the insurgent States, in which such suffering may be said to exist, and to relieve the people thereof, and provide them with corn and other seed for planting a crop sufficient for an annual supply to each family requiring such relief.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH. To what class does it refer?

Mr. KELLEY. Those who are referred to in the memorial I had the honor to present some time ago. They are white mountaineers of Alabama, who served in either army. They are the poor white people of northern Alabama.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will insert the word "white."

Mr. KELLEY. I do not suppose there are any colored people in those mountains. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the preamble; and it was also agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ROSS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference. I do not want to place myself in the condition of some other gentlemen claiming the credit of manufacturing this bill. It was one that was passed at the last Congress. It is a bill to construct a ship-canal for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

LONG BRIDGE.

Mr. ROLLINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the facts concerning the interruption of travel over Long Bridge, and report the reasons why said bridge is allowed to remain impassable for months.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO OFFICERS, SOLDIERS, AND SEAMEN.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back without amendment Senate joint resolution No. 34, expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CRUDE PETROLEUM.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I now ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax or duty, and for other purposes.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. ROSS. I supposed this was intended for reference.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I object to the introduction of the joint resolution.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will explain.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I have no objection to an explanation, but I shall object after it is explained.

Mr. MOORHEAD. It was reported unanimously by the committee. A committee from the oil region came down here and showed a terrible state of affairs, arson and anarchy, in consequence of this act. These gentlemen appeared before the committee and satisfied us that it was a state of affairs that required prompt action. The same provision is in the bill. This will only make it act three or four weeks sooner.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Why not send the soldiers to put the burning down?

Mr. MOORHEAD. That would be very expensive.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the House.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I do not withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked if there was objection, and paused, and no person objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KUYKENDALL] did persist in his objection, and I am bound in justice to say that gentlemen all around here heard him. He objected when the Chair called for objection.

Mr. MOORHEAD. He did not object from his seat.

Mr. BROMWELL. I objected from my seat, but was not heard by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objected from his seat it is good.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I notified the Chair in time that I would renew the objection after the explanation.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he renewed it that is sufficient.

Mr. RAYMOND. I wish to say that when the Chair put the question whether there was objection the last time, I distinctly heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KUYKENDALL] say "I object, of course." It may not have reached the Speaker's ear.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois states that himself, that is enough.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I objected certainly.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois was not in his seat when he objected.

The SPEAKER. The point of order comes too late. The objection of the gentleman from Illinois was in time.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the gentleman would not object if he would hear the bill fairly explained.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I object to any article being brought in here and exempted before the main bill is acted on. I do not know but that I shall object to exempting this article even in the main bill, but I certainly object to taking a particular article from the main bill to exempt it before anything else.

Mr. MORRILL. There are peculiar circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, objection being made.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU APPROPRIATION.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DONNELLY in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 545, making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with; and the bill was then read by clauses for amendment, when no amendments were offered.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DONNELLY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being bill of the House No. 545, making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. In line twenty-four of the bill I notice an appropriation of $3,000,000 "for sites for school-houses and asylums." Now, I have understood that land in the rebellious States has become very cheap by reason of the suppression of the rebellion, and if we are going into the building of school-houses on a scale large enough to require an appropriation of $3,000,000 for the mere purchase of sites on which they are to be built, it seems to me to be a little "steep." I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain that.

Mr. STEVENS. The report of the Commissioner of this bureau, if the gentleman will turn to it, sets forth the whole matter. I hope the gentleman has read it. It shows most urgent need for this appropriation, because these school-houses, which have been built in a great many instances upon abandoned lands, at a very great expense even to some of the freedmen, have nearly all of them, by order of the President, been restored to the rebel owners; and now the Department is obliged to go into the purchase of lands for school-houses for these poor, willing people, or to have no school-houses at all. The estimate which has been made amounts to what we have reported in this bill. There are now at this time, or there were at the time the report was made, between a hundred and a hundred and fifty thousand scholars, and there are now over two hundred thousand, who are all to be turned out unless this appropriation is made. I think it is the most wholesome provision that could be made; and that no like sum of money will be paid out for a better purpose. They have never had half the number of school-houses they should have had for the purpose of accommodating even the present number of scholars.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I think this claim in relation to school-houses should be transposed; it is now somewhat imperfect.

Mr. BLAINE. With land at $500 an acre, an appropriation of $3,000,000 would be enough to purchase sites for fifty thousand school-houses.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the clause in relation to school-houses and asylums by inserting after the word "sites" the words "and buildings." It will then read: "For sites and buildings for school-houses and asylums, $3,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That was the very clause in regard to which I desired to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] We could not hear the conversation of gentlemen on the other side, and do not know what that clause was intended to mean. It seems to be a very large sum for sites for asylums and school-houses.

Mr. STEVENS. It has been amended so as to include sites and buildings.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That makes a very different thing of it.

Mr. BANKS. I would inquire what is the nature of the transportation for which this bill makes an appropriation of $1,980,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that, by the operations of the Government in restoring the forfeited and abandoned lands to their former owners, a great many of these freedmen must be transported to other places; the Department has been driven by the action of the Government to transport many of these people to other places.

Mr. BANKS. It seems to be a very large sum for transportation alone.

Mr. STEVENS. It is for transporting both refugees and freedmen. And the amount of money expended at this moment for refugees it will be found is more than double the amount expended for freedmen.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will not consent to have this bill go over for a day or two, in order that it and the report of the Commissioner may be examined. I perceive that it appropriates $11,500,000 and more, which is certainly a very large sum, and the bill should be fully understood by the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I had supposed that every gentleman who felt any interest in this matter had examined the subject and knew all about it. The bill is based upon reports of the Commissioner made since the 1st of December.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a word?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I am inclined to think, upon looking over this bill, that it was prepared with reference to another condition of facts. I was not in our committee when this bill was passed upon by them. But my impression now is that the sums named in the bill are based upon facts, to a certain extent, that do not now exist. For example, very many of the persons for whom transportation was originally designed, whether refugees or freedmen, have already been transported to their homes, or to places where they have found employment. I say this is my impression. Whether my impression is correct or not, I think we ought, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] suggests, to take sufficient time to ascertain whether it is not practicable to cut down this large amount of appropriation. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] knows that I am in error, of course my reason for delay is without foundation. But I think we ought to take a little time to examine into this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I know only what the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, General Howard, has informed me. Twice within the last week he has urged me to have this bill passed, stating that it was impossible to go on with the operations of that bureau unless this bill be passed. All the transportation and all the clothing which the bureau has been supplying is to be paid out of this appropriation, and it is the urgency of the case which induces me again to call the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the bill on the table; and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 91, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Marshall, Morris, Niblack, Noel, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, and Winfield—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Deftrees, Deming, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kuykendall, Lafin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Sullwell, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Barker, Broomall, Bundy, Culver, Davis, Delano, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Myers, Nicholson, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sawyer, Scofield, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, and Wright—65.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, who was absent during the call of the roll, stated that if present he would have voted in the negative.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; and

An act for the relief of George R. Frank, late a captain of the thirty-third regiment Wisconsin volunteer infantry.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU APPROPRIATION—AGAIN.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and move to amend by reducing the appropriation from $3,000,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That is right.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the committee on freedmen have given this subject some examination; and I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it would not be well to refer this matter to that committee, that they may report upon it.

Mr. STEVENS. There seems to be some difficulty among gentlemen around me, because they are not well informed in regard to this matter. I desire to say a word of explanation.

These commissary stores, for instance, are stores furnished out of what is already on hand. These stores, instead of being sold, have been furnished, and are still being furnished, to these freedmen, and they are charged to this bureau. These stores are furnished, not only to the freedmen, but also to the refugees in much larger proportion.

One word as to the necessity for appropriations for transportation. I have in my hand a note from General Howard, stating that without an appropriation it is impossible for him to furnish the necessary transportation to these people. Numbers are flocking into this city to whom he desires to furnish transportation; but he cannot do so. He has gone as far as the Secretary of War will allow him to go under the present appropriation. I will ask the chairman of the committee on freedmen [Mr. ELIOT] to state whether these things are necessary or not.

Mr. ELIOT. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I will state that this subject has not been particularly examined before the committee on freedmen. But I have personally, as a member of the House, taken some pains to ascertain, by inquiry at the office of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, in regard to these items of appropriation; and I should be very glad to answer any inquiry which any gentleman on the floor may feel disposed to put concerning the propriety of any of these items.

In respect to the appropriation that is called for in connection with the quartermaster's department, I would state that except the clothes which properly belong to women and children, all the clothing has been obtained from the quartermaster's department at the values of the articles. They have been charged, so far as they have been heretofore obtained, to the bureau. The estimate is made here showing the amount which will be wanted during the coming year, not to go into the market and purchase clothing, but to go to the quartermaster with requisitions, so that clothing which would otherwise be sold for half price—for there is a very large amount on hand—will be sold to the Freedmen's Bureau at full price. It is not taking money from the Treasury at all; it is simply to enable the Freedmen's Bureau to purchase from the quartermaster's department clothing which that department has now on hand. That does not, of course, include the clothing for women and dependent children.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire in reference to the first section of the bill. I notice that it provides these sums shall be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for the fiscal year commencing January, 1866. I want to know what the support of abandoned lands means.

Mr. ELIOT. That is simply the title of the bureau. The law creates a bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. First the bureau is provided, and then we have freedmen, and next abandoned lands.

Mr. ELIOT. It is the name of the bureau, and that is all. In regard to the transportation I will say a word.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to ask another question before the gentleman proceeds. Has this expense been incurred, or is the appropriation to be hereafter used? If a part has been incurred, what portion is hereafter to be used?

Mr. ELIOT. Which appropriation does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I mean in the aggregate.

Mr. ELIOT. It would be impossible to answer that question accurately; a portion has been used and a portion is to be used.

In regard to transportation, about twenty-two thousand refugees and freedmen have been transported, and those twenty-two thousand have been charged by the quartermaster's department to the Freedmen's Bureau. That has all to come out of this appropriation. It is estimated that about forty-four thousand will want to be transported. If the gentleman desires it I will state who they are and what they are. There are in this District, because of the war and because of the demand for labor, some four or five thousand who can have homes provided for them by the Government, and who will cost nothing to the Government when they have been removed to these homes. They cannot get there now, and a part of this is to pay that expense.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How much of the three millions for sites for school-houses and asylums has been expended?

Mr. ELIOT. There has been no money appropriated for or expended in the purchase of lands or buildings I am aware of.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, there is no school the expenses of which have been borne by the Government. It has never paid for any tuition. All the expenses of tuition have been defrayed by benevolent associations of the North and West. There are some thirteen or fourteen hundred teachers employed, and there are some ninety to one hundred thousand scholars.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether this $3,000,000 has been founded upon any report?

Mr. ELIOT. It has been.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How, if that $3,000,000 be necessary, can $1,000,000 be stricken off, without consultation with any committee or bureau, without impairing the efficiency of this service?

Mr. ELIOT. It cannot be done. This estimate of $3,000,000 was founded upon a certain amount for each school and for a certain number of schools, so much for each school. In some portions of the South the price of land and building is larger than in other portions. The estimate, so far as it could be, has been accurately made at the Department. Striking down the appropriation $1,000,000 it will disable the bureau from accommodating as many as if it had $3,000,000.

Let me say there are a great many scholars, children of white people, who are instructed as well as the children of freedmen.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On what report is the estimate made?

Mr. ELIOT. On the report submitted by the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau; and on a report in reply to the Committee on Appropriations.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has either here on his desk or at his room a communication from the Commissioner stating in detail the items which he wants, and the reason why they are needed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But I wish to know if the committee have made any report upon which we can act intelligibly upon this or any other item in this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. A report has been made from the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen; the gentleman will find it among his documents.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What I ask is whether the committee have made any report.

Mr. ELIOT. What committee?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The committee reporting this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will state that we considered this item for school-houses and asylums three or four times in the committee, and it was fully discussed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would inquire how the titles of these school-houses and asylums proposed to be built by the bureau are to be taken.

Mr. ELIOT. In the name of the United States; all the property will belong to the United States.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does this constitute a permanent system or a temporary one?

Mr. ELIOT. It must necessarily be temporary as we all presume. It is one of those things which we cannot get clear of. It is temporary, but it costs something now. Let me say that the buildings which have been heretofore used for school-houses have been taken from the rebels who had formerly occupied them. School-houses were deserted and abandoned here and there which could be made available. But now these buildings have been taken from the possession of the bureau and have been substantially returned to the owners, and the time has come when these one hundred and twenty-five thousand children, white and black, will be taken from their buildings unless the Government for a season interposes.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask upon what authority he makes the assertion that if the public school-houses in the South erected for the education of white children are returned to the white people of the South, the white children will be kept out of school?

Mr. ELIOT. I have not said any such thing.

Mr. CHANLER. I understood the gentleman to say that unless this appropriation was made for these school-houses which have been seized by the Government, formerly held by the rebels, now used for white and black children, these children will be turned out. He made that assertion, and I want him to state upon what authority he can show this House that the white children of the South are educated by this bureau; and I want him to show by what authority the education of the white children will be lessened by not following out his plan.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot consent to get myself into a controversy with the gentleman now.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not want any controversy. I want an answer to the question.

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman has got through I will try to answer him. I have not said that the white children of the South were educated with the black children. I have said no such thing. Nor have I stated anything from which such an inference could be drawn. What I said was simply this: that in conducting the affairs of the bureau, education has been given to the children of refugees as well as to the children of freedmen. And this: that where a school-house which has been used, or another building which has been used for the education, under the administration of the bureau, of freedmen's children and of white children, shall have been taken from the bureau, that school would be broken up unless the Government interposed. That is all I designed to say.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I suppose I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I certainly understood the gentleman to say that the white and black children were educated together.

Mr. ELIOT. Well, I hope I have put it right now. I did not mean any such thing as that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is not the fact, then?

Mr. ELIOT. I do not know anything about it. I suppose all shades of color are to be found there, and it would be hard to distinguish some of them from white.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If that is the case, then the gentleman referred to these mixed races only.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman must inquire of his Democratic friends; they know much more about that than we do. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not think they understand the Freedmen's Bureau better than the gentleman does. He has been the father of that measure, if not of any of these colored children. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELIOT. Well, it is a very good child, and I am not ashamed of the offspring.

Mr. CHANLER. A question has arisen in this interlocutory discussion as to the appropriation for these school-houses.

The gentleman from Massachusetts asserted, if I understood him, that these school-houses which were built by the people of the South for the education of white children, were at one time taken by the Government away from the white children and that black children were put into those school-houses which were intended by the southern people for the education of white children.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; I did not say it in that way.

Mr. CHANLER. No, not in that way; but that was the effect of what the gentleman said. The gentleman asserted that these school-houses in which black children were being educated were taken from the white children.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. And now he proposes that an additional appropriation shall be made whereby the United States Government shall build other school-houses for the blacks alongside of those which were originally built for the whites.

That is the whole of his position, as I understand it, stripped of the verbiage with which it is clothed.

Mr. ELIOT. Well, the gentleman does not understand it at all.

Mr. CHANLER. Of course not; and it is impossible to understand a system by which the white population, robbed alike of their lands and of the system of education which they had built up for themselves, are to be taxed by this bill, as well as the people of the North, to sustain a Freedmen's Bureau raised for the purpose of holding the South in subjection to a political party. It is impossible to understand a system which links together with infamy a pretext of philanthropy.

Mr. ELIOT. Now, if there are no other inquiries which gentlemen desire to make I resign the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I have here a letter from General Howard, dated the 10th of March last, urging the passage of this bill, and I have also here his estimate giving in full all the items.

Mr. KASSON. What is the date of his report accompanying the estimate?

Mr. STEVENS. The date of his report was the 19th of December last; and then in a letter, upon my application to him, under date of March 5, he increased the amount. The committee, however, have provided in this bill for the original estimate.

Mr. DODGE. Will the gentlemen allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT?]

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. DODGE. The estimate for transportation is $1,980,000. It was made in December last. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to state that there have been twenty-two thousand transported since that time.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; before that time.

Mr. DODGE. Before that time?

Mr. ELIOT. I suppose it was before December. I do not know. It was before the time I made the inquiry.

Mr. DODGE. The average cost of transportation over five hundred miles on railroads is ten dollars for each person. An appropriation of $1,800,000 at the same rates would transport one hundred and eighty thousand persons. I suppose that since December, when this estimate was made, the occasion for the transportation of such numbers has very greatly diminished and it seems to me, therefore, that this item might be very much reduced.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would like to say that we may essentially reduce the amount of the appropriation by a modification of the phraseology of the bill. For example, it is found that commissary and quartermasters' stores have, to a large extent, been already used by simply taking the material on hand.

Why, then, in lieu of this very large appropriation, should we not, by this bill, authorize a credit on the accounts of those departments, and the accounts settled at the Treasury upon the vouchers of this bureau?

It seems to me that we can avoid shocking the public mind, as it will be shocked by this large appropriation, larger I suspect than our pension list is to-day for the soldiers of our Army; we can avoid shocking the public mind, and more economically accomplish the necessary objects of this bill. We can give the protection which we are bound in honor and good faith to extend to this class of people, and at the same time reduce, very essentially reduce, the magnitude of the appropriations in this bill.

Why should we not also provide for the modes in which this money shall be expended, instead of leaving it without any limit to the discretion of the officers? If they are to use the machinery of the War Department, we should say so in this bill.

I assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that my desire is equal to his or that of any other gentleman to do everything that good faith and honor requires of us for the protection of this class of the community. But I also greatly desire that we shall so frame a bill that by increasing the number of disbursing officers we shall not increase the liability to frauds and mismanagement. And by transferring the machinery of the War Department from one object to another, and the money from one account to another, we will accomplish the same purpose that we seek to accomplish by making this large appropriation independently.

A single statement further, and I have done. This bill runs from the 1st of January, 1866, to the 31st of December, 1866. Contrary to our usual custom, we are establishing a new fiscal year for this bureau. By the provisions of the act establishing this bureau, it is to expire in one year from the establishment of peace; and it is generally regarded that the proclamation of the President fixes that period. Now, we should do one of two things: either make this according to the recognized fiscal year; or else provide for the expenditures of the bureau until it expires by limitation of law. We should also provide for the proper securing of the titles to these sites for asylums and school-houses, and determine whether, and how, we shall keep them after the bureau ceases to exist, and if so, how long. These are important questions, which I think require further time for examination, and I hope the bill may be recommitted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I observe this clause in this bill: "for salaries of assistant and sub-assistant commissioners, $147,500." Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is the father of the Freedmen's Bureau, I think that, as the step-father in one sense, I may claim to know something about it. The bill which is now actually the law upon the statute-book is a very simple bill in its provisions, and one which was got up in the committee of conference as a sort of compromise between the two Houses.

Knowing something of the history of this bill, I can state from recollection, without referring to it particularly, that among its provisions is one requiring that the Commissioner and sub-commissioners should either be appointed from civil life or might be detailed from the Army; so that officers already employed upon salaries paid by the Government can perform the duties of the bureau. That provision was the more essentially necessary, inasmuch as there was no appropriation made when the bill was passed for carrying out its provisions. In consequence of that provision pretty much all the work of the commissioners and sub-commissioners has been done by detailed officers of the Army. And unless it be for the purpose of keeping an account between the Army and the Freedmen's Bureau, so that the bureau shall be charged with the salaries of those detailed officers of the Army, I do not quite understand how it can be that $147,500 should be needed or expended in paying the salaries of these officers.

I may remark that I say this as a friend of the bureau, as one who appreciates to the full extent the services of General Howard, its head, as one who wishes to sustain the bureau in every particular. But I think we should understand how it is that an appropriation should be called for so large as this to pay the salaries of commissioners and sub-commissioners, when, if I rightly understand the matter, in fact and in law, the business of the commissioners and sub-commissioners is performed mainly, if not almost altogether, by detailed officers of the Army, who draw their salaries from another fund.

Mr. STEVENS. So the Commissioner states in his report. But he also states that they are liable to be mustered out at any moment. He wishes, therefore, to be able to employ assistants independently of that altogether. This is all set forth in the report.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania under what part of the Constitution he thinks Congress derives the power to build school-houses and educate the people of the South, taxing my constituents and his to pay the expense.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the law of nations, which is a part of the Constitution, and enables us to govern conquered provinces. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, there has been much more objection than I anticipated on this side of the House to educating these poor people. I fear that some of our friends here still retain a portion of their old hatred of the negro. In view of the objection which is made, I modify my amendment and move to amend by striking out $3,000,000 in the item for schools and school-houses, and inserting in lieu thereof $500,000. On this amendment, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 41, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bonwell, Brandegee, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Garfield, Ginnell, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, James M. Humphrey, Kuykendall, George J. Lawrence, Loan, Newell, Niblack, Noell, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, Trowbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Winfield—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Culver, Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Myers, Nicholson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Seefeld, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Wentworth, and Wright—63.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ROLLINS stated that his colleague,

Mr. MARSTON, was detained from the House by sickness.

The result was announced, as above stated. Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICO.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed of the message of the President of the United States and the accompanying documents on the subject of Mexico, under date April 23, the same number as is now provided by law for the printing of the general diplomatic correspondence.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COTTON LOAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the House, a letter of the Secretary of State in regard to the rebel debt known as the "cotton loan;" which, on motion of Mr. KASSON, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be House bill No. 344, to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, and that the pending question was on the substitute of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. I ask leave to offer the following amendments:

Strike out sections seven, twenty, twenty-one, and twenty-two.

Add the following:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That before entering upon the survey or construction of this canal, the consent thereto of the State of New York shall be obtained, and said corporation and all its property and franchises shall at all times be subject to the laws of the State of New York.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Is that in order?

Mr. ALLISON. I only yielded to the gentleman to submit some remarks, and not for the purpose of offering amendments.

The SPEAKER. Then the amendments cannot be received.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY then concluded his remarks, begun when the bill was last before the House. [The entire speech will be found in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] had ten minutes of his hour left.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendments:

Section twenty, line seven, after the word "payable," insert "in lawful currency of the United States;" also in line fourteen insert the same words; so that it will read:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $6,000,000 shall be loaned by the United States, in the manner and at the times hereinafter provided, to the company hereby chartered, and its successors, to aid in the construction of said canal, and shall be advanced and paid in the bonds of the United States in denomination of $1,000 each, payable in lawful currency of the United States in twenty years from their date, which said bonds shall be made and issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in the usual manner, and duly attested and dated the 1st day of September, 1866, payable at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 1st day of September, 1886, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, in lawful currency of the United States, from and after the 1st day of September, 1866, upon warrants or coupons to be annexed thereto, signed by the Treasurer of the United States, duly numbered and registered in a book to be kept by him for that purpose. The said interest to be payable and the said bonds to be redeemed out of moneys to be hereafter appropriated by Congress.

Section twenty-two, page 21, line three, after the word "thereof," strike out, "after deducting the cost of repairs and the expenses of operating and improving the same;" so that it will read:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That from all the tolls which shall be collected upon vessels, rafts, floats, and property passing said canal, ten per cent. thereof shall, on the 1st day of January in each year after the completion of said canal, be paid by said company into the Treasury of the United States, which moneys, with the interest accruing thereon, shall be applied toward the payment of the principal of the sum so to be loaned to said company, as is herein provided, from time to time as shall hereafter be appropriated by Congress.

Add to section twenty-three the following proviso: Provided, That said rates of toll may at any time be reduced and regulated by Congress.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I accept those amendments as modifications of my substitute.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the discussion of the merits of the particular bill now before the House for its consideration, I wish to say a word in relation to the general purpose sought to be effected by this class of improvements, namely, the opening up of new and the enlargement of the natural channels of communication whereby the agricultural products of this country may have a cheap and easy transit from their points of production to the markets of the world.

It is manifest that by whatever sum we lessen the cost of transportation, by that sum we enrich either the producer or consumer of these products. I undertake to say that in the aggregate there is no class of our people that receive so little reward for their labor as those who till the soil, and no class will be more benefited by the class of legislation here proposed than the agriculturist, inasmuch as we have for many years produced a surplus of breadstuffs which must be exported in some form. The foreign market for this surplus affects the price of the product consumed at home. Hence it is that the markets in Liverpool control, to a great extent, the price of the wheat, the corn, the beef, and pork at Chicago or upon the farms of the West. Our farmers are thus brought in competition with the wheat-growing countries of Russia, Egypt, and Turkey, and whatever will cheapen the cost of transportation of the products of the farm will aid the farmer until the demand at home or abroad exceeds the supply when the consumer will be benefited. The States most directly interested in this subject are the great prairie States of the West, as they produce nearly if not all the surplus cereals now produced in this country, as will be readily seen by a reference to the statistics upon this subject.

In 1864 there was produced in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, one fourth of all the live stock produced in this country, amounting in value to $240,000,000, in round numbers; of wheat, more than one third, or 60,000,000 bushels; of corn, nearly one half, or 230,000,000 bushels; of cattle, 2,000,000, or one third of the whole product; and of hogs, 4,000,000, or nearly one third of the whole product. This, with a population of about three tenths of the whole population of this country. The surplus of this enormous product must find a market in New England and other eastern States or it must go abroad. I but state the truth when I say that our farmers are now being ground to powder between the upper and nether millstone of monopoly that requires for transportation to New York one bushel of wheat for every bushel transported from the Mississippi to New York, and two for every bushel of corn thus transported; and for this reason they are looking with intense interest upon our deliberations here to give them some relief whereby their toil may be properly rewarded. The measure now before the House I have no doubt will be of material service in the right direction. But it is not enough, and this Congress will fail in the discharge of one of its most important obligations to the country if it adjourns without passing an act to remove all obstructions now in the way of the safe and continuous navigation of the great river that threads itself midway between the oceans that mark our eastern and western boundary, running from the British possessions to the Gulf of Mexico. That is the natural highway for the commerce of the Mississippi valley, both to the eastern portions of our own country and to foreign markets.

And the West will not be content until the obstructions in the way of successful navigation of this river are removed, the most material of which lie upon the borders of Iowa and Illinois.

We are told that we must find a home market by building up in our midst manufactures, and thus bring the consumers of bread to the doors of those who produce it. I will say or do nothing that would discourage the growth of manufactures in the West or elsewhere in our country, but by proper and prudent legislation encourage their growth, and to that end would welcome eastern capital seeking investment in that direction. Yet no one who has beheld and traveled over our boundless and fertile prairies can fail to see that this region is destined to become, if it is not now, the granary of the world, and with all the looms and spindles of New England and the forges and rolling-mills of Pennsylvania transplanted there we would still have a surplus of agricultural products that would be transported a long distance before a market could be secured. It is safe to assume that the increase of population, including immigration, will keep pace with production of cereals and breadstuffs, and the agriculturist will always seek the cheapest and most productive soils. It has been reasonably estimated that of wheat alone there will be produced at the beginning of the next century annually five hundred million bushels, and of corn at least three times that number of bushels, one half of which will be produced in the prairie States west of Chicago, and chiefly consumed at points east of Buffalo, and must in some form be transported thither. This cannot be done except through the improved natural channels which nature has worked out by way of New Orleans and the great lakes. And here I wish to correct an error in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBURD] is common with many others has fallen, namely, that because of the nature of the Gulf stream and the warm climate wheat and corn cannot be transported by way of New Orleans. This difficulty does not now exist, as by means of elevators at convenient points on the river the wheat and corn can reach New Orleans in a perfect condition, from which it can be easily and safely transported to any of the markets of the world; and the fact is that the United States exports wheat and flour to Portugal, Brazil, and Australia, and England imports largely from Turkey and Egypt; all this commerce being across the tropics subject to the climatic influences which prevail in the Gulf.

I mention these general facts in relation to this subject that the House may understand that the West will imperatively demand, and now, that this great river shall have removed from it the obstructions which hinder and impede its safe and easy navigation. This House has partially recognized this great want in the passage of the river and harbor bill, on yesterday, but the sums there appropriated will scarcely more than commence the great improvements demanded to secure the uninterrupted navigation of the Mississippi river from St. Paul to the Gulf.

In demanding these improvements we do not ask for the establishment of any new policy, but only a full recognition of the long-established policy of the Government, often disputed, but as often asserted in the legislation of the country. The same grant of power to regulate commerce with foreign nations authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. This power has been asserted from the foundation of our Government, in making appropriations for light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers erected or placed within the bays, inlets, harbors, and ports of the United States to render navigation safe and easy, and for the last ten years we have appropriated not less than $1,000,000 annually for this purpose, without objection, in order to protect the foreign commerce of the United States, when in fact our trans-oceanic commerce does not amount to more than one tenth of our domestic commerce, and when the former could not have existed, for the last few years but for the productions of the food-producing States of this country.

Sir, the tonnage of the Erie canal alone amounted to more than the total tonnage transported to and from the United States for the years 1862 and 1863. The five States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota, lying west of Chicago, bordering on the Mississippi and on the lakes, furnished one third in value of the staples exported during the years 1861, 1862, and 1863. And here I shall take the liberty of quoting from an address delivered by a distinguished citizen of my own city, P. Robb, Esq., before a convention of shippers and merchants held at Dubuque, which sets forth in concise terms the value of this commerce to our country. He says:

"An examination of the statistics fully establishes the additional fact that these five States during the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, shipped East one hundred and fifty per cent. more corn and meal, and twenty-five per cent. more pork products than were exported from the entire country during the same period. These States not only supply the export wheat of the entire country, but also the export corn and pork products. The contributions, therefore, made by Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Minnesota, and Iowa, to the exports of the United States in these three leading agricultural staples alone, are as follows:

Wheat.....	$48,938,780	$44,187,138	$55,647,979
Corn and meal.....	6,387,160	9,600,879	9,623,357
Pork products.....	4,687,784	10,217,281	16,424,338
Total.....	$60,013,724	$64,017,308	$81,695,674

"Excluding gold, silver, and bullion, which are hardly analogous to other products, and the entire exports of domestic products of the United States amounted in 1860-61 to $217,666,953; in 1861-62 to $190,699,387; and in 1862-63 to $260,666,110.

"The average exports of the country for the three years was $222,874,133 33, and the average exports which these five States contributed in wheat, corn, and pork alone was $68,575,568 66, or very nearly one third.

"In 1861, 1862, and 1863, the average yearly tonnage of all American vessels engaged in trans-oceanic commerce and entering the ports of the United States was 2,504,257 tons, and the average tonnage of all the vessels of all countries engaged in oceanic commerce and entering the ports of the United States was 5,341,867 tons. Now, the three staples contributed by these five upper Mississippi States to our exports were equivalent to 1,315,000 tons annually. They, therefore, not only contributed one third in value to our entire exports, but gave employment upon the ocean to more than one half of all our American tonnage, which was equivalent to one fourth of all the tonnage of all nations, our own included, entering the United States and engaged in the trans-oceanic commerce. History cannot furnish a parallel. But for the relief afforded by the productive industry of this section our national credit would have been seriously impaired, and ships must have rotted at their wharves."

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have not the time to quote more largely from this address, which is in itself a complete argument on this subject.

Is it possible that those who organized our Government intended to confine the power to regulate commerce to that only which appertains to our intercourse with foreign nations, a power the most important in its creation and most extensive in its operation which can belong to any Government? Is it not certain that they intended to remove this power from the disjointed and conflicting legislation of the States and place it under the auspices of a united and efficient Government, a power to be largely, liberally, and beneficially construed in furtherance of the great objects of Government, to be exercised prudently and wisely by the Congress of the United States, and to operate as well within the several States as upon our foreign commerce?

We are imperatively called upon now to exercise this power in behalf of the agricultural interest of the country in order to furnish competing lines for the transportation of their products, so that the corn of the prairies may reach New England and the East where it is needed for consumption and exportation, instead of being burned as now for fuel. We want these improvements to encourage the development of the great West, so that the food-consuming States may have cheap bread and the farmer may receive an adequate reward for his toil.

And inasmuch as this bill has a tendency to diminish the cost of transportation by creating a competing line of communication, it will receive the support of the people of the western States and the sanction of their Representatives.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] finds fault with this measure because he can find in the Constitution of the United States no power to pass it; but if he will refer to the measures that have been at various times before Congress he will see that it has become the uniform policy of the Government to engage in these great works of internal improvement. There has scarcely been a Congress that has not in some form or another recognized this principle in our legislation. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] objects to this measure because it is within the State of New York alone, because it does not connect any two States, but the whole of the proposed improvement is necessarily in the State of New York. He seems to forget that it unites by water communication the great chain of lakes which float the commerce of many States and opens a direct communication with the ocean that bears upon its bosom the commerce of the world.

Now, I think this bill finds its sanction in many provisions of the Constitution, as in the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States;" "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "and provide for the common defense," "to provide and maintain a navy," &c. It is admitted that this measure will be one of necessity for the protection and defense of our northern lakes should we come in conflict with England.

But the gentleman says we are not likely to have a war with that country. Why, sir, upon the principle he advocates we cannot cast a cannon nor build a fortification in time of peace, because it is not necessary except as a war measure. We could not build a ship for the protection of our commercial marine because we are not engaged in war. I believe the true policy of the Government is, in time of peace to prepare for war. Therefore it is that whatever is necessary to control and protect the commerce of our great northwestern lakes and the States bordering upon them as a war measure, the Congress of the United States certainly has power to adopt, and it is the sole judge of the exigency which shall call for the exercise of that power.

But another objection of the gentleman is that it interferes with the proper local jurisdiction of the State of New York. The gentleman from New York will bear in mind that we are constantly interfering with the local jurisdiction of the States. We have done it in a marked instance in the passage of a national banking law whereby we controlled the moneyed interest and power of this country by the creation of national banks. By the operations of that act in the State of Iowa, which I have the honor in part to represent, a State bank system has been utterly destroyed. Under the constitution of that State a charter organizing a general banking system in that State must be submitted to a vote of the people, and we had a system there which had been thus submitted and passed upon favorably; and yet, under the national banking law, our State bank system has been utterly ignored and driven out of existence, and without the consent of the State Legislature. A national system has been established there in violation of our State policy. So that we do interfere with the local policy of States by our legislation here, and we have the constitutional power to interfere when it is necessary for the general interests of the Government, or to carry out specific powers granted in the Constitution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa to conclude his remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. I am certainly much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois. I desire to say one thing with reference to the policy of the State of New York on this subject of canals. I say that the policy which that State has adopted is sufficient in itself to justify the Congress of the United States in interfering with it by the adoption of this measure.

I hold in my hand the Proceedings of the Canal Board of New York, wherein they report to the Legislature of that State that this Erie canal, which the gentleman says cost $100,000,000, instead of being a charge, has actually been a benefit to that State, and has placed in its treasury $9,000,000 over and above the money expended for the construction of the work, nearly all of which was levied as a contribution upon the grain-producing States of the West. And yet the State of New York proposes now, by its interference here, to prevent the western States from transporting their cereals across that State unless they pay tribute to that State in the way of tolls such as it may see proper to impose; and it is for that reason and to establish a competing line of transit that this measure is proposed, for the purpose of depriving them of this monopoly of transportation between the lakes and the sea.

I know, also, that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY,] when a member of the New York Senate, introduced a bill for the purpose of enlarging the Erie canal, showing that he believed at that time, as every one but him now believes, that we do need additional facilities by which the cereals of the western States can be transported to the city of New York and to the markets of the East. How did he propose to enlarge that canal? He proposed to do it by means of locks, which were to pass vessels of six hundred tons burden, and to levy upon the commerce of the western States seventy cents on every ton transported through that canal, in addition to the tolls levied by the State of New York upon its own citizens to pay for its construction and enlargement.

Now, the very fact that it has been the policy of the State of New York to compel the produce of the West to pass through the Erie canal or over her railroads, in order that she may control at will the commerce of the western States, and levy tolls upon that commerce, is in itself a just reason why we should interfere and pass this measure, in order that Congress may have control over this national highway, connecting the lower with the upper lakes, and thus connecting the lakes with the ocean, which thus far has been to us an unknown sea. And in order to keep this question of tolls within the power and control of Congress, I offered the amendment to the twenty-third section of the bill, giving this control to Congress, in order that we may not escape from the rapacious jaws of one class of monopolies to be swallowed up by the voracious maw of another; and in the hope that this competing highway may be used to cheapen transportation upon all the great lines eastward upon which we now depend to carry off our surplus productions, and in some degree to meet the growing wants and expectations of an industrious, intelligent, and virtuous population, now numbering millions, who have cast their lot west of the great lakes and in the valley of the Mississippi. And here I wish to express the thanks of that people to the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who spoke so eloquently on Saturday of the growing wants of this great nation, and to his colleague, [Mr. ELIOT,] for his earnest, persistent, and successful effort to improve the great river upon which we must largely depend hereafter for the transportation of our products.

Mr. Speaker, if we would keep pace with the growing civilization of the age in which we live, we must foster and encourage our internal commerce, by opening up new avenues, and improving the natural highways which Providence has carved out for us, and thus encourage every branch of our varied industry, and enable us with ease to meet the great responsibilities and burdens imposed upon us by the rebellion and war through which we have passed, and from which we have so triumphantly emerged. This improvement is but one link in the great chain of improvements necessary to develop our great material interests, and raise this nation to the high and brilliant destiny that awaits it.

Mr. Speaker, the measure as it is now presented, I believe, has in it but few if any objectionable features, unless it be the fact that it authorizes a corporation to construct this canal instead of providing for its construction under the direct auspices of the General Government. For myself, I would prefer that the Government should itself undertake this great work of material improvement, in order that it might be as the ocean, free for the commerce of the world; but I have no doubt that whatever we could do by ourselves we can do through the necessary and proper agencies we may create. That we have the power to create a corporation for this purpose was decided by the Supreme Court in the case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland, where it was decided expressly that Congress has power, where an object is necessary to be accomplished, to create the means by which that object may be accomplished, and that it may create a corporation as one of the means, if that is deemed the best way to accomplish the end sought to be attained.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I remember with some what of pride that in the Thirty-Eighth Congress I voted in favor of a bill of this character, for the construction of a ship-canal around Niagara falls, and also a bill to aid in enlarging the Illinois and Michigan canal, and after a considerable contest I had the proud satisfaction of seeing those bills pass this House by a very respectable majority. And I remember with what grateful feelings the people of the West responded to that action of Congress upon witnessing the exhibition of the generous spirit in this House which regarded not merely the interest of certain localities but the entire country. Early in the present session I introduced a bill providing for the appropriation of $5,000,000 to aid the State of Illinois in enlarging the Illinois and Michigan canal to the capacity of a ship-canal. And now, if it were not for fear of embarrassing the passage of this bill, I would offer as an amendment the bill which passed this House at the last session to enlarge the Illinois and Michigan ship-canal. But I feel certain that if we pass this bill for a canal around the falls of Niagara, it will be a step well taken in the right direction; and that having taken that step, the second step will easily follow, which will be the passage of the bill for the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan ship-canal, and thus without embarrassing this bill we will secure the other also; and thus those two great national works will receive the sanction of the national Legislature. Complete these two great works and you will have done more to aggrandize the Republic than by anything you have ever done, except it be the crushing out of the rebellion.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] objects to the passage of this bill, because he says that by virtue of a treaty now existing between this Government and the Government of Great Britain we can have but two war vessels upon the northern lakes and but one upon Lake Ontario, and consequently we cannot regard this measure as one of military necessity or as one required to provide for the common defense, as the treaty provides that we shall not enlarge our power upon those lakes. Now, let me remind the House and the gentleman from New York of what he no doubt overlooked for the moment, that in case a war should ensue between Great Britain and this country the provisions of all existing treaties between the two countries would be at once annulled, and we should then be free to exercise whatever power we might desire for our protection and self-preservation by building as many war vessels as we might deem necessary.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot, for my time is limited.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. Only a moment. Mr. INGERSOLL. Not an instant; not an instant. I should be glad to, but my time is too precious.

Now, if we build this Niagara ship-canal we will have it as an offset against the British power in the use of the Welland canal. And if war shall occur between this country and Great Britain they will at once proceed to build their gunboats on Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, and move them with the greatest facility from one lake to the other, as necessity should require, through the Welland canal, which would be closed against us. Give us this Niagara ship-canal, and we could go to work in our ship-yards, in case of war, along the entire lake shores from Ogdensburg to Chicago, and build a fleet of war vessels which we could move with equal facility through our own canal and thus be prepared to defend ourselves in a manner which would be impossible at present. Thus, in a military point of view, this canal is indispensable to the Government.

And I say here that no civilized Government on the face of the earth, with such a chain of lakes within her borders, and with a foreign Power on her frontier, would have existed ten years without connecting those lakes by a ship-canal. And yet we have existed for eighty years without such a canal, though our fathers showed their appreciation of its importance, not only in a commercial, but also in a military point of view, by urging upon Congress the necessity of the work. Let us at once perform this work, which is so much needed by the commercial, the manufacturing, and the agricultural interests of the country, and which is so necessary for the common defense of the whole country.

Let us look for a moment at the nature of the work, and see whether its magnitude is such as should deter us from entering upon it. This bill provides for the expenditure of but $6,000,000, and that, too, in the shape of a loan, and that not in money, but in bonds to be repaid to the Government out of the earnings of the canal. Ten per cent. annually of the net earnings of the canal are to be returned to the Treasury of the United States. That is all this bill provides; and who is it who will say that that is not an outlay of credit that will pay the greatest rate of interest the Government ever received? In a few years every dollar would be repaid to the Government.

We have looked upon the Chinese as a sort of semi-heathen people, never as a commercial people. But they have within their borders a continuous canal communication of over one thousand miles in extent. The Government of France, under the reign of Louis XIV, built the Languedoc canal, connecting the Bay of Biscay with the Mediterranean, rising to a summit level of six hundred feet above the sea; a work perfectly stupendous in comparison with this. In Holland we have an example of national energy and commercial enterprise looking to the welfare of the people that it would be well to follow. They built, more than forty years ago, a canal from Amsterdam to the Helder, fifty-one miles in length, one hundred and twenty-five feet wide at the water-level, twenty feet deep, with an average width at the bottom of thirty-one feet, in order that the commerce of Holland and the world might avoid the dangers of the coast navigation.

Great Britain on our own continent has set an example worthy of imitation in building the Welland canal and other canals in Canada for the benefit of commerce, and for the protection of her dominions in time of war. The Caledonian canal is another great work built by the British Government in Scotland. It rises to the summit level over the rocky highlands of Scotland to an elevation of nearly one hundred feet. It is a ship-canal with twenty feet depth of water and with an average breadth of one hundred and twenty feet. This was constructed to avoid the dangers of the Pentland firth and the Western islands.

These are some of the works that other nations have performed, where their interest was as nothing compared with our interest in this great project, either in a commercial or a military point of view.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] tells us that the tariff and tolls on the Erie canal have been wonderfully reduced. Why, sir, the Erie canal was completed in 1825. When did the first reduction take place? Just about the time of the completion of the Welland canal, ten years later. That was made to some extent a competing canal, by virtue of treaties between this country and Great Britain. The New York Central railroad was completed in about the year 1840. That was another competing line. Other railroads sprung up over the country, connecting the East with the West; and in consequence of the competition created by these various lines of transportation the Erie Canal Company found it necessary for their business that they should reduce their tariffs and their tolls. Had not these competing lines been built there would have been no reduction, or next to none, either in tolls or in tariffs to the present day.

The Erie canal has been of incalculable benefit to the country. Had that canal never been constructed we would, in all probability, have had no magnificent West to-day. It opened, as by the power of magic, the way for enterprising emigrants to settle the West, and they were not slow to take advantage of it; and since the completion of that canal in 1825, the West may date the day of her onward march of prosperity and greatness. But the West needs to-day another canal, and further and greater facilities of transportation, more than she ever did the Erie canal; for unless these needed facilities of transportation be extended, the West will find herself worse off than though her population were less than half of what it now is and her agricultural products reduced in the same proportion, for we must have cheaper rates of freight for the transportation of our western products, or the industry of the West will be paralyzed. There will be no stimulus for agriculture, for the products of the farmer will not pay transportation to market. This state of things cannot last long. The West demands additional facilities of transportation. She will have them. If she cannot get aid from the Government, she will build the necessary works herself. And in order to perpetuate and promote a good feeling between the East and the West, and continue in that prosperity which has made the country rejoice, it will be the work of wisdom for the eastern and middle States to respond favorably to this demand of the West, for these States will be as much benefited as will the western States themselves.

Now, sir, in the early history of the Government, even John C. Calhoun, when he was Secretary of War, was in favor of this system, not of internal improvements, as some may be disposed to call them, but this system of national works, as necessary to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. Hear what he said in 1824, when Secretary of War:

"Let us bind the Republic together; let us conquer space by a perfect system of roads and canals."

These are precious words; they were uttered by Mr. Calhoun before he had become tainted with secessionism or nullification, and I repeat them here to-day to his credit. Happy would it have been for him and for the country had he never uttered any sentiments at war with these.

Why, sir, had the Government of the United States, prior to the war of 1812, built a great national road from here to Detroit, would Hull have made his ignominious surrender? No, sir; because we would have had the means of transporting men, cannon, and other munitions of war for the national defense in sufficient numbers and quantity to have prevented that deplorable event. It was estimated in the last war that a single cannon taken from our foundries in the East to Detroit cost its weight in silver to get it there. Yet this state of things the old fogies of ages past, though yet living, would continue if they be permitted to control the legislation of the country.

Let us avoid the errors of the past. Let us "in peace prepare for war." If war should come, and it may be not far distant, you will then say, "What a pity it is that we did not build the Niagara ship-canal when we were at peace." Then it will be too late; now is the time for action.

Now, sir, with regard to the commercial importance of this measure to the country, East and West, no language is adequate to do the subject justice. Why, sir, it is estimated that by this great work the cost of transportation on every bushel of grain will be reduced ten cents at least from Chicago to New York and Boston. Consequently, it will be ten cents increase to the producer and ten cents reduction to the purchaser. Suppose, then, we transport one hundred million bushels of grain per annum, which, in a few years, will be but half the actual amount transported from the Northwest. There you have $10,000,000 saved to the producer, and $10,000,000 saved to the consumer. As the honorable gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] remarked, "the effect will be to make a loaf of bread in Connecticut twice as large and cost but half as much as at present," not that the hundred million bushels will all go through this canal; but the construction of this work will have the effect to reduce freight on railroads and other lines of transportation to that extent if not more. By this means we shall enhance the value of western and eastern industry more than twenty million dollars per annum, a sum exceeding more than three times the amount proposed to be loaned by this bill, in the shape of Government bonds, for the building of this great national work.

Sir, I have here statistical tables showing the immense advantages of this work, especially to the agricultural interest of the West and to the whole country generally. Why, sir, Illinois, during the last year, notwithstanding she furnished a quarter of a million men for the Army for the preservation of the Republic, raised one hundred and seventy-seven million bushels of corn. That noble State raises one fourth of the entire corn product of the United States, one fifth of the wheat, and one seventh of the oats, and sends to the New York market more beef cattle than all the other States together.

But I will draw no invidious comparisons between Illinois and the other northwestern States. In proportion to their population and arable lands they do equally as well.

I will now give the House some statistics which will be instructive in estimating the importance of this work, and which will be of interest to the whole country. I read now from the report of Hon. W. J. McAlpine, late State engineer of the State of New York, in his report to the Legislature of that State in the year 1855. These are conceded to be reliable data:

Cost of transportation per ton per mile is:		Mills.
On the Ocean, long voyage.....	1½
" short voyage.....	2½	to 6
" Lakes, long.....	2
" short.....	3	to 4
" Hudson river.....	2½
" Mississippi and St. Lawrence.....	3
" Erie canal (enlarged).....	4
" Ordinary canals.....	5
" Railroads (ordinary grades).....	12½	to 13½

Now, the distance by the lake from Chicago to Buffalo is one thousand miles; and the actual cost of transporting a ton of freight, according to the estimate of Mr. McAlpine, is two mills per ton per mile, or—

For a ton of freight from Chicago to Buffalo.....	$2 00

In 1860 the whole number of acres of improved land in all the States and Territories was.....163,261,389

Of this—
Missouri contained.....	6,246,871
Illinois.....	13,254,473
Iowa.....	3,780,253
Wisconsin.....	3,746,036
Minnesota.....	554,397
	27,579,030

Or a fraction less than one sixth.

The total value of crops for 1864 is estimated by the Agricultural Bureau of the Department of the Interior to have been.....$1,564,543,690

Of this sum—
Illinois produced.....	$214,488,426
Wisconsin.....	51,938,852
Missouri.....	52,996,592
Iowa.....	71,100,481
Minnesota.....	13,168,123
	403,692,474

Or more than one fourth of the value of the entire crops of the country. But these estimates of value are the estimated value of the various products in the States where produced. In this way the value of articles in the above States appears to a great disadvantage, because being so far from market, they are rated much less than the same articles in other States, especially those near the sea-board. The same is true of the estimated value of the live stock, which, on the 1st of January, 1865, was.....$990,879,128

Of this—
Illinois had.....	$116,588,288
Missouri.....	44,431,768
Iowa.....	66,572,496
Wisconsin.....	36,911,165
Minnesota.....	8,860,015
	273,363,730

Or more than one fourth. A juster standard by which to measure the productiveness of these States would be a comparison of the amount of their respective products, since the value is so largely affected by the distance from market.

"The great staples of agriculture are wheat, corn, beef, and pork. Comparing these, we find that the total number of bushels of wheat produced in all the States and Territories in 1864 (except the cotton States, whose production was almost nominal, probably not more than one sixth of what it was in 1860) was.....160,695,822

Missouri.....	3,281,514
Wisconsin.....	14,168,317
Iowa.....	12,649,807
Minnesota.....	2,634,975
	66,105,786

Or a fraction less than one half.

The total number of bushels of corn produced was.....530,451,403

Illinois produced.....	138,356,135
Missouri.....	36,635,611
Wisconsin.....	10,087,053
Iowa.....	55,261,240
Minnesota.....	4,647,329
	244,986,768

Or nearly one half.

The whole number of cattle and oxen, January 1, 1865, was.....7,072,591

Illinois had.....	978,700
Missouri.....	471,006
Wisconsin.....	388,760
Iowa.....	561,338
Minnesota.....	127,175
	2,526,979

Or more than one third.

The total number of hogs was.....13,070,887

Illinois had.....	2,034,231
Missouri.....	988,357
Wisconsin.....	340,638
Iowa.....	1,423,567
Minnesota.....	109,016
	4,896,506

Or more than one third.

The entire population of the United States in 1860 was.....31,443,322

Illinois contained.....	1,711,951
Iowa.....	674,913
Missouri.....	1,182,012
Minnesota.....	172,123
Wisconsin.....	775,881
	4,516,880

Or about one seventh.

"Thus it will be seen that these five States, possessing only one seventh of all the population and one sixth of all the improved land, nevertheless in 1864 produced more than one fourth in value of the entire crop, more than one fourth in value of all the live stock, more than one third in number of all the cattle and hogs, and nearly one half of all the wheat and corn grown in the United States. Here we find four and one half millions of agriculturists along the upper Mississippi producing in a single year from one third to one half of all the production of the leading staples of an estimated value of $677,056,204.

"In the fiscal years 1861, 1862, and 1863, the United States exported 89,941,508 bushels of wheat and 6,997,470 barrels of flour, valued at $148,673,907. During those same years we shipped from the lake ports named 85,577,516 bushels of wheat and 7,530,893 barrels of flour. Reduce the flour to bushels and we have as the entire exports of wheat from the United States for the three years, 124,828,902 bushels. Shipments from the lake ports named for the three years, 123,231,981 bushels.

"The contributions, therefore, made by Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Minnesota, to the exports of the United States in these three leading agricultural staples alone, are as follows:

	1860-61.	1861-62.	1862-63.
Wheat.....	$48,938,780	$44,187,148	$55,647,979
Corn and meal.....	6,387,160	9,609,879	9,623,357
Pork products.....	4,687,784	10,217,281	16,424,238
Total.....	$60,013,724	$64,017,308	$81,695,674

"Excluding gold, silver, and bullion, which are hardly analogous to other products, and the entire exports of domestic products of the United States amounted in 1860-61 to $217,686,953; in 1861-62 to $190,699,387; and in 1862-63 to $260,666,110.

"The average exports of the country for the three years was $222,874,133 33, and the average exports which these five States contributed in wheat, corn, and pork alone, was $68,575,568 66, or very nearly one third."

Thus it will be seen what the West has done in her giant strides within the past few years, and he who is possessed of a brilliant, volatile imagination may have some conception of what the capacity, the power, and the glory of this country will be a quarter of a century hence. We are apt to think too much of the present and not enough of the future. We legislate too much for the present and not enough with reference to the future. The wisest and most far-seeing man of twenty-five years ago did not even dream of the realities of the present day; and then shall this country a quarter of a century hence say the same of us with reference to our present legislation? Let us try to comprehend the vast resources of the country and the power of its people under favorable circumstances, to build up a republic which shall be the controlling Power of the world in an agricultural, manufacturing, and mechanical point of view. We have the richest lands and the richest mines, the mightiest rivers and the greatest lakes on the face of the earth, and if we but make a proper use of the mighty and inexhaustible means in our hands, we will be one day, and that not far distant, the greatest, wealthiest, most intelligent, and happiest people that ever existed.

Now, the State of Illinois alone numbers 2,250,000 people, and the group of States known as the northwestern States more than 10,000,000 people. Forty years ago they all did not contain more than 1,000,000 souls. Then Chicago was known as an Indian trading post; now it contains a population of nearly a quarter of a million, and is the greatest grain, lumber, and pork market on the globe. Why, sir, since that day a republican empire has sprung into existence, which contains within itself more elements of strength and greatness than any empire in the Old World, with perhaps the single exception of the Russian empire. We have already astonished the world, and if we continue to increase in the present ratio of prosperity, we will not only astonish but amaze the world. Who can with certainty predict the future greatness and glory of the Republic, when it is ascertained with mathematical accuracy that according to the present ratio of increase of the population of the United States, in 1870 we will number 42,000,000 people; in 1880, 56,000,000; in 1890, 77,000,000; and in the year 1900, 100,000,000.

Sir, if the country is not cramped by the beggarly parsimony of narrow-minded and short-sighted men, it is safe to assume that the increase of her agricultural and mechanical products will increase in the same ratio as her population. How totally inadequate, then, will be the facilities of transportation of the western products, with a population of 50,000,000, when all the lines of transportation are inadequate to carry off the surplus produce of 10,000,000 people to-day.

Think of it for a moment, and reflect upon the astounding fact, that but a few years ago this great Northwest was but one vast wilderness!

Washington, the Father of his Country, when Illinois was inhabited by the wild savage, when the entire Northwest was marked on the map to a great extent as a region unknown, had a deep appreciation of the future grandeur and glory of our country. Speaking of the western country, eighty years and more ago, he used this language:

"For my own part, I wish sincerely that every door to that country may be thrown wide open and commercial intercourse with it rendered as free and easy as possible. This is in my opinion the best if not the only cement that can bind these people to us for any length of time, and we shall be deficient in foresight and wisdom if we neglect the means of effecting it. Our interest is so much in unison with this measure that nothing short of that misjudged parsimony and contracted way of thinking which intermingles so much in our public councils can counteract it."

It is said to be unconstitutional for the Government to construct a work of this character. I have no time to enter into an elaborate constitutional argument on this question, but I must say a few words. The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power, first, to establish post offices and post roads; second, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States and with the Indian tribes; third, to raise and support armies and provide for the common defense; and fourth, to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers.

If the power of Congress could be questioned under the first and second powers above quoted, how could it be questioned under the third, which declares that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies and provide for the common defense? Congress can provide for the common defense without either an army or navy, and consequently may neither raise an army nor build a navy, and yet it may provide for the common defense by other means.

If it is necessary to provide for the common defense of the country to build a fort, then it is constitutional to build a fort. If it is necessary to provide for the common defense that we should have cannon and cannon-balls, then it would be constitutional for Congress to establish a cannon foundry wherein to cast guns; so we might establish a dozen or a hundred foundries, and so we might work the iron-ore bed to get the material wherewith to cast the cannon. It is a question, in the first place, of necessity, and in the second place a question of means.

The extent of the necessity is not measured in the Constitution, and the character of the means is not specified. Under this power in the Constitution we have established arsenals, dock-yards, navy-yards, military academies, naval academies, and done many other things to provide for the common defense of the country. Under this power we educate men in military schools and pay for their education out of the public treasury. Congress is to judge of what is necessary to provide for the common defense, and Congress is also to select the means whereby the country is to be defended. If a ship is necessary we build it; if a fort is necessary we build it; if an arsenal is necessary we build it; and if Congress determined that a ship-canal is necessary to the common defense, it ought to be built, and unless Congress provided for the building of that canal it would be derelict in its duty to the country.

The Secretary of War, in 1824, made use of the following language in his report:

"Many of the roads and canals which have been suggested are, no doubt, of the first importance to the commerce, the agriculture, and the manufactures and the political prosperity of the country, but are not for that reason less useful or necessary for military purposes. It is, in fact, one of the great advantages of our country, enjoying so many others, that whether we regard its internal improvement in relation to military, civil, or political purposes, very nearly the same system, in all its parts, is required. The road or canal can scarcely be designated which is not highly useful for military operations, and which is not equally required for the industry or political prosperity of the country."

It gives no weight to the argument against the constitutionality of this bill to declare that the chief feature of the work is in its commercial value to the country. No matter how beneficial it may be in a commercial point of view if it is also in a military point of view a necessary means of defense to the country, then it is constitutional for Congress to make the appropriation for the construction of such work.

I will simply add in this connection, that the Constitution, in section eight of article one, in addition to the powers already referred to, provides that Congress shall have power to provide for the general welfare of the United States. This is a very broad and comprehensive power, and might, if needed, be quoted as a justification of the constitutional power of Congress to pass this bill, for if there be any one enterprise which is calculated to promote the general welfare of the United States, it is an enterprise which involves an increase of the facilities of transportation from the great West to the great East.

But we are not driven to this stress to defend this bill under the Constitution. We have a complete vindication, so far as the constitutional power of Congress is concerned, in that clause of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have power to provide for the common defense. I should have little regard for the talent or the honesty of a man who should contend that a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario, is not necessary for the common defense of the country.

That great man Albert Gallatin, as long ago as 1808, in his celebrated report said:

"The opening of an inland navigation from tide-water to the great lakes would immediately give to the great body of lands bordering on those lakes as great value as though they were situated at a distance of one hundred miles by land from the seacoast."

He appreciated the importance of this work, and urged with great earnestness and ability a plan upon Congress for its construction.

The most enlightened and comprehensive statesmen of our country have from the earliest period of our Government been in favor of extending aid by the General Government in the construction of this great work, and they never were at a loss to defend the constitutionality of their views in the comprehensive language of the Constitution itself.

Congress is the only power under the Constitution authorized to judge and determine as to the necessity of the measure in providing for the defense of the country, and it is also the only power which has the constitutional right to determine what means shall be made use of to secure that protection except in time of war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has spoken fifteen minutes, the time which was allotted to him.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. Cook.]

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, this question was so fully discussed in the House during the last Congress that I do not expect that anything that I can say will shed any new light upon it; and yet, as it is a question of so much interest to the people of my own State, in common with those of other western agricultural States, I have been forced to consider it with care, and I wish to submit a very few suggestions upon it to the House.

The proposed work is shown to be practicable. The report of Captain William G. Williams, of the United States Engineer corps, House Document 214, Twenty-Fourth Congress, first session, made by an officer of high professional attainments, demonstrates the practicability of the enterprise.

The cost is small. The report of the engineer fixes it at from three and a half to five millions, according to the route chosen. The increase in the price of labor and material since the report was made make it necessary to increase this estimate somewhat, and accordingly the sum is now fixed at $6,000,000.

Can the loan of the credit of the Government be constitutionally and properly given to this work as a work of military necessity? We have been called upon at this session to appropriate very large sums of money for the erection and repair of fortifications along our Atlantic seaboard, and to some extent upon the lakes. I do not question the propriety of such appropriations, and I think that it can be demonstrated that the principle which would justify them would justify the passage of this bill. To illustrate this: we very properly appropriate a sum of money to repair and garrison a fort at Oswego, for instance. Now this is wholly for the defense of that city and harbor, and is wholly unnecessary except in case of hostilities with Great Britain—no other enemy could ever reach that point—and the appropriation is made. But in the event of hostilities with Great Britain or her American dependencies this ship-canal would be a thousand-fold more available for the defense of the country than Fort Ontario. We have nearly or quite three thousand miles of lake coast. The whole line of this coast is studded with flourishing cities, the marts of business and the avenues of commerce. We have upon the lakes some four thousand vessels. An enemy in command of the lakes could do us more injury than would result from the reduction of any one place in the country. The whole trade and commerce carried on in the four thousand vessels of the lakes would be at the mercy of an enemy who could place a superior force upon their waters. The damage that would result to the business interests of all parts of the country in such an event can scarcely be calculated.

By treaty with England we are prohibited from maintaining upon the lakes more than a single vessel-of-war, to be armed with a single gun; and we have no war vessels upon Lake Ontario or the St. Lawrence. It is true that the British Government is also limited to a single war vessel, but it has facilities within its own territory for the concentration of fleets and material of war upon the lakes. The Canadian canals are so constructed as to be available for this purpose. The British Government is prepared, in the event of war, to assert an entire supremacy upon the lakes, for she can send the necessary naval force from the St. Lawrence to do so; while we have not a naval station on the lakes where a single vessel could be promptly fitted out, nor a fortification that could withstand a modern iron-clad vessel. What vast public and private interests are thus left defenseless. Surely the constitutional right to erect a fortification anywhere is not plainer than is the right to construct upon our side a canal through which vessels-of-war can be transported from the upper to the lower lakes or from the Mississippi to Lake Ontario. But the point to which I respectfully and earnestly ask the attention of the House is this: the work is essential to us of the West to enable us to bear the burdens which have been laid upon us in the shape of taxation, direct and indirect. We are an agricultural people. In the State of Illinois we have but one commercial city, properly so called. The great leading interest of the State is the agricultural interest. We produce an immense surplus of food, which must find its way to the eastern markets. It is the only commodity which we have to exchange for the manufactures of New England; for the coal, iron, and oil of Pennsylvania. The facilities of transportation are wholly inadequate. We have a magnificent water communication between Chicago and Buffalo, sufficient for the transportation of any amount of the products of the West, but at Buffalo our troubles begin. There is a barrier which we cannot pass. The amount of freight offering for shipment from Buffalo eastward is so great during the season of navigation that the owners of boats can and do demand and receive almost any amount of freight they choose to ask.

I ask attention to one fact which I will state and which will show the interest which our people have in this ship-canal. There are five routes by water and by rail from Chicago to the sea-board, and yet the demand for transportation last fall was so great, such vast quantities of agricultural products were waiting to go forward, more than all the lines could transport, that the price of transportation from Chicago to the sea-board was fixed by the dearest route of all, and flour or pork or beef could be as cheaply transported by Fort Wayne and Pittsburgh and over the mountains of Pennsylvania, as by the great water route. The price of our agricultural staples is almost wholly consumed in getting to a market. I know that men answer this appeal by saying, establish manufactures among yourselves and consume your agricultural products at home. This is easy to say, and I trust may one day be accomplished, but it is not presently practicable. Our soil, the cheapest and most productive in the world, invites to agriculture. We have not the capital at command to establish manufactures on so large a scale. We appeal, therefore, to the men of New England to aid us in transporting to them the food which they require, and which we are anxious to exchange for the products of their manufactories, and thus confer a real and lasting benefit upon both sections.

It is a fact that the employment of a farmer at the West is less remunerative than almost any other. There is now more real reason for complaint. I ask gentlemen to consider that, however carefully and skillfully and honestly you may arrange the various systems of direct and indirect taxation, tariffs, and internal revenue laws, the burden of the tax must to a great extent fall upon the consumer. We are consumers of the manufactures of the country. Our interests are not directly protected in your tariff laws, but we could bear all public burdens easily and cheerfully if it were not for the difficulty of reaching the markets of the world with the bulky products of our farms. If this canal is constructed, by opening a new route by water to the eastern markets and to the markets of the world, it will not only reduce the price of freight by affording new facilities for transportation, but will create a competition by which freights on established lines will be reduced to reasonable limits. When a vessel of one thousand or twelve hundred tons can be loaded in Chicago, and can reach the ocean without breaking bulk, the day of the prosperity of our great agricultural interest will have dawned. I believe that very rarely have we the opportunity offered us to accomplish so great a good at so small an expense as by the passage of this bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern branch; and a bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market; in both of which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL—AGAIN.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I propose to submit the question to the House whether they will order the main question to-night and close this discussion, or let the bill go over until to-morrow for another hour's discussion.

Mr. DAWES. Before the gentleman calls the previous question I desire to offer an amendment to his substitute.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following amendment to the substitute:

In section ten, line seventeen, after the word "Massachusetts," insert "the aforesaid subscription books shall be kept open at the places designated under aforesaid notice for at least three days." And insert after the word "and," in the nineteenth line, the words "after the aforesaid three days," so that the section will read:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That John C. Dore, of Illinois; Philo Chamberlin, of Ohio; Eldridge G. Merrick, of Michigan; David Dows, Abraham P. Grant, James D. Cooper, of New York; James Little, of Massachusetts; and Edward H. Brodhead, of Wisconsin, shall be commissioners to open books for subscription to the stock of said corporation, on which shall be paid at the time of subscription ten per cent. thereof, and they shall open such books on or before the 1st day of August next, at such places as they may appoint, having first given notice of the time and place of meeting for that purpose by publishing the same once at least in each week for four weeks successively in a public newspaper printed and published in the city of New York; Chicago, in the State of Illinois; Detroit, in the State of Michigan; Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin; Cleveland, in the State of Ohio; and Boston, in the State of Massachusetts. The aforesaid subscription books shall be kept open at the places designated for at least three days. A majority of said commissioners shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and they may adjourn from time to time, and after the aforesaid three days, to such places as they may think fit, until the requisite number of shares shall be subscribed for; and in case a surplus of shares shall be subscribed for they may apportion them among the subscribers in such manner as they shall think for the interest of the said corporation.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I accept that amendment. I have no disposition to prolong this debate, and unless some gentlemen desire otherwise, I will now move the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Close it now.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I demand the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I ask my colleague to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I will hear what the amendment is.

Mr. WARD. I desire to move to strike out the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first sections. They are the sections which appropriate the money of the Government to defray the expenses of this work.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. WARD. If that is not done I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cannot a separate vote be required on the appropriation, under the rules, on the demand of one fifth of the members present?

The SPEAKER. That rule applies to cases where there are various appropriations in the bill, as was the case with the river and harbor bill passed yesterday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does it not apply to "appropriations of money for works of internal improvement of any kind or description?"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refers to rule 121, which is to be found on page 189 of Barclay's Digest. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"121. Upon the engrossment of any bill making appropriations of money for works of internal improvement of any kind or description, it shall be in the power of any member to call for a division of the question, so as to take a separate vote of the House upon each item of improvement or appropriation contained in said bill, or upon such items separately, and others collectively, as the members making the call may specify; and if one fifth of the members present second said call, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to make such divisions of the question, and put them to vote accordingly."

The SPEAKER. That rule has always been held to refer to cases like the river and harbor bill which passed yesterday. Where there are various appropriations in a bill for a variety of improvements, there can be a separate vote on each appropriation on the demand of one fifth of the members present. But the Chair rules that this being an appropriation for a single object, a separate vote cannot be called for on the separate sections of the bill.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have not taken up much of the time of the House this session, but having reported this bill, and feeling great interest in it, I desire to occupy a portion of the time allotted to me by the rules, and then I will yield a portion of my time to some other gentlemen who desire to be heard briefly upon the subject.

Mr. Speaker, in presenting this measure to the House and the country, I do it with the greatest confidence that the appeal in its behalf will meet with a warm and generous response. It is not a new measure, and perhaps every member of the House is familiar with its object, its plans, and details. For very many years it has attracted more or less attention from the Government and the people, and been received with more or less favor. Amid the general indisposition to do nothing for public improvements by the party in power for many years prior to the war, this great project shared the fate of others of like nature and importance, and was not undertaken. Both branches of our national Legislature, however, have acted upon it in various ways, by favorable reports, by ordering surveys, and in the last Congress by passing a bill providing for the construction of this work. Upon the files of Congress are petitions, memorials, and resolutions from the people, Boards of Trade, and Legislatures urging the construction of the work this bill proposes to provide for, and instructing Senators and Representatives to endeavor to secure it if possible. Full reports upon the whole question, covering the surveys and estimates, and showing the great importance of the works are on file, one of which I had the honor to present in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, to all of which I direct the attention of the House.

This bill provides for the appointment of proper engineers by the President, who shall make the necessary surveys and reports, upon which the route of said canal shall be determined upon its merits, taking into account the twofold purpose of military and commercial advantage. The President is directed to procure the right of way by negotiation if possible; if not, by application to the court for the appointment of commissioners to appraise damages, and determine all cases of difference that may arise.

It further provides that the Government shall loan $6,000,000 to this company, of twenty-year bonds, in consideration for which the United States is to have forever the practical ownership of the canal for all military and naval purposes whatever, and ten per cent. of all the tolls of said canal are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States on the 1st of January of each year, to be applied toward the payment of the money so loaned for the construction of the work.

It is further provided that the United States may at any time enter upon and purchase said canal by paying ten per cent. in addition to its actual cost. All the necessary provisions and safeguards for the protection of trade and commerce against exorbitant tolls and neglect in keeping it up and in perfect repair and order are inserted, and believed to be ample and just to all.

The grounds of the opposition made to this bill by my colleague [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] are not new by any means. While he argues that it is inexpedient and unjust to open up this communication, for the reason that it might interfere somewhat with the rights and interests of New York, he takes the old ground that the General Government has no right to take such care upon its hands and aid in the construction of such works.

Sir, this policy has vetoed all the great measures of improvement and internal development that have been pressed and desired in the past, and put a check upon the enterprise and industry of our people. The country owes to the great national party of the present and the past few years a debt of gratitude it can never pay for arresting this narrow-minded and weak policy of opposition to public improvement and fostering of great national enterprises like this, and introducing our people to a broader, more comprehensive, and eminently national system of aiding such enterprises, as a means of developing national life and national prosperity and wealth. As to the power of Congress over these matters I am obliged to differ with my colleague, while I have great respect for his opinion, but as my time is limited I shall not be able to discuss at any length the constitutional question involved; besides, other gentlemen have said all that is necessary to be said upon this part of the subject.

This denial of right to Congress over these questions and the action of the Government in the same direction, defeated under the administration of Mr. Buchanan the Pacific railroad bill, which has since received the favor of the new Administration, and our whole country is destined to share in the great benefits that will flow from such a result.

A broad national policy of internal improvement is what is to arouse the energy and industry of our people, develop the resources and locked-up wealth of our vast continent, and give a permanency and vitality to our prosperity that can in no other way be secured. Any narrow view of this great question of national development is not in accordance with the character and genius of our people. They are alive to the importance of such great works of improvement, and believe that the public domain, the national credit, and the fostering care of the Government, in every way that they can reasonably and properly, should be given to aid the work of bringing out the enterprise and industry of our whole people and lifting them up to the highest point of civilization and national prosperity.

The passage of this bill is still urged, as heretofore, upon the two considerations of military and commercial necessity and importance. My colleague declares that there can be no real military necessity or importance connected with this proposed work, and that that idea is only advanced to catch votes or deceive the unthinking. He argues that instead of resulting in benefit to the Government, or intending to work a benefit to the Government in this direction, under the plea of military necessity or advantage there is a design to draw from the Treasury of the people of the United States $6,000,000 and put it into the pockets of a selfish corporation. Now, sir, this remark will apply as well to every body of men who have, by the aid of Government in the various ways heretofore granted, added prosperity and wealth to the nation by their enterprise and sacrifices in the way of such public improvements. It is very easy to make such wholesale declarations, but the facts do not always justify them.

My colleague should remember that selfishness may control him a little in the opposition he makes to this measure. He may be moved to this opposition by considerations not altogether generous, to say the least. The main part of the opposition to this measure has always been in the city (Buffalo) so ably represented by my colleague; and in whose prosperity no one feels a deeper interest than myself, and I fear that he as well as the city he represents does not upon this question always present that broad, generous, and expansive feeling and action that would take in all our broad land, with its best and highest interests. Sir, those who are the advocates of this measure here and elsewhere are controlled by a great national purpose and desire, and while they hope to secure a safe investment for private capital, they seek to add to the national defense and prosperity. But let us consider its military necessity and importance.

I know it has been urged, is, and will be again, that as a work of military necessity, such a canal would have no importance, and be of no practical military benefit. It is said that in the event of a war with England or Canada, or both, our policy would be to rush upon Canada with such a force as to take immediate possession of their frontier and the Welland canal, and thus have a canal at our hand, already constructed, by which we could keep open the communication between the lakes and the West, and thus be able to afford protection when and where it might be needed without serious difficulty. All this is very well, and I should favor such a move in such an event, but we have found that there are uncertainties connected with war as with other matters, and that it will not do to rest all upon a single expedient, but be prepared for any emergency.

Again, it would be a very easy thing to so lay waste such a structure before it fell into our hands, if, indeed, it should, rendering it of very little practical use when taken possession of. Besides, actual difficulties between foreign Powers do not spring up in a day, but are often the result of long-continued aggravation before forbearance gives way and the strife begins; and in such event the most formidable demonstrations and preparations are made by way of defense and means of resistance. It is idle for us to talk of subduing all opposition so easily that no means of defense and shelter ought to be made as an alternative. I still insist that this canal, constructed in such a way and where it will afford protection to American commerce and war material in transit from lake to lake, will be a work of great military benefit in time of war, and I cannot see how any sensible man, with all respect to my colleague, can argue to the contrary.

Celerity of movement, rapidity of transfer from point to point, is essential in naval as in military affairs. Our Canadian neighbors have a canal connecting the lakes on their side of the Niagara river, sufficiently inland to be entirely protected, unless the country between it and their frontier be taken possession of, which, of course, would be held by them to the last moment as of the first importance. It will be seen, therefore, that they have the means for rapidly transferring their boats and vessels of war from point to point on the lakes, which we have not. We have no means of communication but by land, so that the struggle in many instances might be confined on our part entirely to land operations, and we suffer seriously as a consequence. They could move from lake to lake as occasion demanded, transferring all their power from point to point at their will.

Were this work completed our whole field of operations would be changed, and we be prepared to at least equal them in facilities for preparing suitable defense to all our borders.

Again, such a canal would form a great base of supplies for naval and military operations for a border war, with facilities to throw to any desired point with great dispatch the materials necessary for the support and maintenance of a war upon our borders. It would impart strength and efficiency to our fleet upon the lakes, and afford a safe passage to our commerce even in a time of war, which would otherwise be obstructed and broken up.

At great expense the British and Canadian Governments have already constructed and in progress complete lines of communication between and to connect all their border waters, so as to secure every possible commercial benefit, and afford all their border the amplest protection in any emergency that may arise. During our civil war, when the London Times occupied any attitude but a friendly one, it was declared by way of boasting that they could throw with but little warning, upon any point upon our frontier, any amount of force, and such vessels of war as the emergency might demand.

And who does not know that such is the fact? Their enterprise, their foresight, and their wisdom in this regard have been far in advance of ours. We, too, should be prepared for all such emergencies, and take timely steps to secure the desired result. Captain Williams, one of the most celebrated engineers the Government ever had, who was directed to and make a survey for this work some time ago, and whose report is on file, after examining the whole ground and taking a careful survey of the whole question in all its attitudes, urges with great force the military necessity of this work, and insists that the Government ought to immediately enter upon its construction. He says that its importance in a military point of view cannot be overestimated. This conclusion was arrived at in a time of peace, when there was no prospect of war, but was the result of careful and intelligent understanding of the advantages of such a work in a time of war, and is worthy of our highest consideration.

According to the treaty of 1817 we were restricted to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons, with a single gun, for Lake Ontario, which is the key to all the great chain of lakes on our border; and also confined to two of like size and armament for all the upper lakes. Having no inland waters communicating with these great thoroughfares, we have not been able to have in readiness any vessels of war outside of these lakes which could be thrown upon them in case of necessity, and thus we have been left entirely without adequate protection. But the British Government, always selfish and seizing every opportunity for providing defenses, has steadily pursued a policy directly opposite ours, one looking directly to the command of the lakes by a sufficient naval force whenever she might choose to assert it. Since 1817 she has constructed the Rideau canal as a military work, so avowed, connecting Montreal with Kingston, on Lake Ontario; by an interior route, with locks one hundred and thirty-three feet long and thirty-three feet wide, well calculated to pass large gunboats in ballast; and the St. Lawrence canals, connecting the same points, with locks two hundred feet long and forty-five feet wide, to pass gunboats drawing nine feet. She has also constructed the Welland canal, as before stated, connecting Lake Ontario with the upper lakes, with locks one hundred and forty-five feet long and twenty-six feet wide, to pass gunboats drawing ten feet of water.

It is also proposed to construct another, of ample dimensions for all purposes, military and commercial, connecting Montreal with Georgian bay, on Lake Huron. Thus it will be seen that she can pass her war vessels from Montreal to Kingston, on Lake Ontario, in twenty-four hours, and to Lake Erie in less than forty-eight hours, and hold all our lake border, and our vast cities and the commerce of the lakes, which is mostly American, entirely at her mercy. At all these inland points of concentration she has constructed and holds large naval depots, thus keeping in constant preparation for efficient naval operations on all the great lakes, while our policy has been just the reverse of this, and we have no means of defense of such a nature, and have no communication between our great inland waters. As I have before hinted, England has boastingly told us that she was prepared for any emergency. In 1861, when the rebel leaders, Mason and Slidell, were seized on the British steamer Trent, and war was thought to be inevitable for a time, who does not remember that it was claimed extensively by the leading and most influential British press that their facilities were complete and ample and the means in readiness to pounce upon our unprotected lake frontier, destroy our commerce, and lay waste our whole border, and that, too, before we could accumulate any adequate means of resistance.

And who can deny the fact of such a statement? There is not a fortification on our frontier that an iron-clad could not pass with impunity, and perhaps batter down with ease. They are old and mostly dilapidated. A long-continued peace has allowed them to be neglected, and no frontier of equal length and importance in our whole country, and I may say in any country, is so poorly protected and prepared to meet the attacks that modern warfare and skill bring to bear in a time of war. This frontier is in extent more than three thousand miles, and has none of the means of defense that are necessary to secure protection or resist attacks. Our mode of warfare nowadays differs very much from that of the olden time. Forts and fortifications are good for something, but cannot compare in importance and real utility with the modern means of resistance and defense. The iron-clads and war vessels of modern times can batter down and subdue the most formidable fortifications that engineering skill and patience can erect; and the experience we have had for the last five years in the great struggle for the nation's life, which has happily terminated so far as the trial of arms is concerned, demonstrates to us conclusively that the whole system of warfare has undergone a radical change, and that hereafter it must be upon a new scale and under different auspices to a very great extent.

Indeed, there has been such a complete revolution in our whole system of warfare and defense that forts and fortifications to a very great extent are giving away to other modes of attack and defense. The system of gunboat fighting upon our lakes, rivers, and other waters, as exhibited during our recent conflict, has become so efficient, and consequently so popular, that the attention of Congress and the Government has been and still will be turned toward developing and extending it to a much larger and more perfect system, and to give it still greater efficiency. All will readily perceive, however, that the efficiency of this practice of warfare depends entirely upon the facilities given to pass from point to point, from lake to lake, and river to river; hence the necessity of a more enlarged system of internal navigation. The general efficiency which the use of railroads and canals gives to a land force, by increasing the rapidity of movement, is one of the principal reasons in favor of this great work, as the force of the upper lakes could be thrown immediately upon Lake Ontario or back again to the points above.

All these facilities the Canadian and British Governments have in their internal communications between the rivers and the lakes, by which, if they hold their territory, they can visit every point on our lines of lake and river coasts, batter down our forts and defenses, lay waste our cities, and destroy our commerce. These are facts that are indisputable, which no argument or sophistry can destroy or cover up.

As I have before stated, the coast from the St. Lawrence to the western shore of Lake Superior is over three thousand miles, and forms a navigable water boundary for eight of the most important producing and commercial States of the Union, with an aggregate population in 1860 of nine millions, while directly on this coast, in towns, cities, and villages, are a million of as enterprising, intelligent, and patriotic citizens as we have, surrounded by all the wealth that an agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial prosperity can bring.

From these cities and through these lakes and rivers we are told that more than one hundred million bushels of grain, including wheat made into flour, and other agricultural products in proportion, are distributed annually to New York, New England, and the Atlantic cities north of and including Baltimore, for the consumption of those States and for exportation to foreign countries. This vast production, yet only in its infancy, occupies more than two thousand steam and sail vessels, measuring full seven hundred thousand tons, which on their return westward are always freighted with foreign and domestic merchandise. The annual value of this trade already exceeds five hundred million dollars. The arrest of this commerce for a brief period would produce disaster both to the East and the West, to the producer and the consumer. As the British Government is constantly prepared for an aggressive war upon all the lakes, complete lines of communication being now open, and naval depots already constructed and furnished to a very great extent, what can prevent all this extensive coast, this vast and constantly increasing commerce, from suffering at the hands of our neighbors, should hostilities ever be opened between us?

This proposed canal is the only link wanting to give free communication to us at all times through and between all the great lakes and the St. Lawrence for the vessels of the largest size navigating the lakes. On the upper lakes the commercial marine is almost exclusively American, while on Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence it is largely Canadian. If naval depots were established at proper points on the lakes, our vessels of commerce, many of them propellers, could be easily and speedily converted into vessels-of-war, and with this canal constructed, they could pass from lake to lake and the St. Lawrence as the exigencies of the case might require. These facilities are indispensable, especially from the fact that the English Government has as great and even greater within her borders. I may say without exaggeration that no part of our coast is so little protected, and in no instance are so vast interests, both public and private, allowed to remain so at the mercy of an unfriendly Power, jealous of our prosperity and national grandeur, and always ready on the slightest pretense to assume a threatening attitude and a hostile position.

But, Mr. Speaker, as necessary as this work is in a military point of view, it is as necessary to the commercial interests of the country, and to all interested in cheap transportation, which will result in benefit both to the producer and the consumer.

In 1862 at least thirty-two million bushels of grain, including wheat manufactured into flour, besides other agricultural products of western States, passed from the upper lakes into Lake Ontario through the Welland canal, paying tribute to Canadian enterprise and adding to Canadian prosperity. More than three fourths of this grain found its way from Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence through American channels, to New York and New England; nearly twenty millions of it being shipped eastward from Oswego and Cape Vincent, and about five million bushels from Ogdensburg over the Northern railroad. The trade from the East to the West of course was correspondingly large, and all paid tribute as before to Canada as it passed through the Welland canal. It is said that the trade from the West to the East is increasing annually at the rate of about twenty per cent., as the great producing regions of the West are being developed and industry and enterprise are being stimulated. The trade through the Canada canal into Lake Ontario, and so on to tide-water, will increase in the same proportion, I conclude, if this canal is not constructed, for every facility that we can give with our present lines of communication by additions and completion will be furnished upon the other side as a matter of policy; in order to present every inducement to business and secure every possible benefit.

To this end arrangements will be speedily completed for the enlargement of the Welland canal to accommodate our largest-sized vessels, which it cannot now accommodate, and which trade upon the upper lakes; so that, without a canal upon the American side, the Welland canal will certainly continue to receive its present proportion of trade, or nearly so, even when the trade shall have reached a greatly increased amount, as it is destined to do. Trade will go where it has the greatest inducements held out to it. This will be conceded by all, for it is the experience of every man of business. How easy it is, in the absence of this competing route, for Canada to so discriminate in favor of vessels and cargoes going to Montreal, by such a regulation of tolls as will divert the trade to Canadian channels; in fact, American interests are entirely in and under her control in this regard while we have no competing route or connection between the lakes. If it be said that the New York canals and railroads are competing routes to the sea-board, and are sufficient for all present and future wants, I deny it. As before said, trade will go where it pleases. Inducements alone can lead and control it, and it will go just as far as it can possibly by vessel toward tide-water without breaking bulk, for it is the interest of both producer, consumer, and forwarder so to do. But, sir, the channels of communication as at present existing are not adequate to the present demands of commerce, and can in no wise meet the demands of the great future.

A committee of the New York Legislature reported a little more than a year ago "that during a considerable portion of the last three years the enlarged canals had been taxed to their utmost capacity, not from deficiency in the main trunk, but from the impossibility of passing more boats through the locks." And everybody knows that the railroads connecting the East and the West cannot take for quite a portion of the time all the freight that is offered in any reasonable time. So great is the necessity for more and larger outlets to the Atlantic to meet the constantly increasing wants of the West, so rapidly developing itself, that the Illinois and Wisconsin Legislatures about two years ago appointed some of their most intelligent citizens to visit the Canadian authorities to urge upon them the necessity of enlarging the Welland canal, and the early construction of the proposed canal between the Georgian bay and Montreal. This completed, and Montreal would be nearer by water route to Chicago than Buffalo is by twenty miles, and nearer than New York is by nearly five hundred miles. With this work constructed we shall be obliged to enlarge all our present lines so as to carry largely and cheap, and open up every possible avenue of trade that will tend to reduce transportation from the West to the Atlantic cities, or we shall lose the ascendancy we now hold and suffer in a corresponding degree.

It may be urged here that if the locks of the Erie canal were sufficiently enlarged there would be no necessity for the proposed ship-canal. I reply, in the first place, that with the ship-canal the Erie canal with its enlarged locks will have all it can do, and cannot meet the demands upon it when the immense increase of trade of the future seeks an outlet to the East; and in the second place, that if the ship-canal be not constructed the Erie canal will not get the trade the ship-canal would get if constructed, for the reason that it will go where it now goes, through the Welland canal, which will have been put in a condition to induce trade to seek its channel.

And again, the further toward the point of destination you can send produce in large quantities in vessel without breaking bulk the cheaper will be the cost of transportation, and in this instance there would be a corresponding gain in point of time. All these advantages will be seized, and we should look at the question practically and act accordingly.

Captain Williams, a distinguished engineer to whom I have before referred, who surveyed the different proposed routes for this ship-canal by order of the Government, and made his report, which is on file, upon careful estimates, no doubt correctly made, says that produce from a given point West can be taken through to tide-water by way of the proposed ship-canal and, of course, by the Welland canal, when of sufficient size, for nearly thirty per cent. less than by Buffalo and the Erie canal, for the reason, among others which I have already mentioned, that but little if any more is charged per ton or bushel to Oswego by lake when once aboard than to Buffalo, while you have saved one hundred and twenty miles of artificial navigation and only increased the whole distance fifteen miles. This is a simple proposition but nevertheless true, and will bear investigation.

By having such a canal upon the American side we would get all the benefits of such a communication and be better able to control the commerce and keep it within our own territory, and by offering it such inducements as our increased facilities would allow us to do we could direct it to tide-water through our own markets, and greatly to the benefit of our own people. This is our duty, and we should not let the occasion pass without embracing it. I want gentlemen from the West who produce, and gentlemen from the East who consume, to understand that there is no way in which you can get so near together and secure so cheap transportation as to open up this connection and allow trade in our largest vessels to reach as near tide-water as possible. I have no fear as to the balance of the work. The people, States, and the General Government are always ready to provide means to meet the demand upon trade. Private capital as well as public aid is always ready to secure every benefit that can be obtained. To save this vast trade of the West, New York will enlarge the locks of her canals when and where necessity calls, and if need be, her canals also. This will have to be done, for it is a narrow view that limits the business of the great future to the very limited capacity of our present thoroughfares.

Cheap transportation results in a corresponding benefit both to the producer and consumer, and this is one way in which transportation can be furnished cheaper than at present with a general benefit and no serious detriment. Facts will demonstrate this to be true. Hon. W. J. McAlpine, late State engineer of the State of New York, in his report to the Legislature on railroads in 1855, presented data from which he deduced the following results:

Cost of transportation per ton per mile is:	Mills.
On the Ocean, long voyage.....	1½
" short voyage.....	2½ to 6
" Lakes, long ".....	2
" short ".....	3 to 4
" Hudson river.....	2½
" Mississippi and St. Lawrence.....	3
" Erie canal (enlarged).....	4
" Ordinary canals.....	5
" Railroads (ordinary grades).....	12½ to 13½

Now, the distance by the lake from Chicago to Buffalo is one thousand miles; and the actual cost of transporting a ton of freight, according to the estimate of Mr. McAlpine, is two mills per ton per mile, or—

For a ton of freight from Chicago to Buffalo.....	$2 00
The distance from Buffalo to Troy is 345 miles, which, at four mills per ton per mile, makes the cost of transporting a ton from Buffalo to Troy.....	1 38
Add canal tolls, at three mills per one thousand pounds per mile.....	2 07
Cost of transportation per ton on the Hudson, at two and a half mills per mile.....	37.5

Making the whole cost, including canal tolls, of transporting a ton of wheat or flour from Chicago to New York, via Buffalo and the Erie canal.....$5 82.5

Cost via the Niagara ship-canal and Lake Ontario: The distance from Chicago to Oswego, via the proposed ship-canal, would be eleven hundred and eighty miles, which, at two mills per ton per mile, would be.....	$2 36
The distance from Oswego to Troy, by canal, is one hundred and eighty-seven miles, which, at four mills per ton per mile, for transportation, would be.....	74.5
Add canal tolls, at three mills per one thousand pounds per mile, on wheat or flour.....	1 12.2
Freight on Hudson river at two and a half mills per ton per mile.....	37.5
Add Niagara ship-canal expenses, per ton.....	20

Making the cost of transporting a ton of wheat or flour from Chicago to New York, via the proposed ship-canal and Lake Ontario.....$4 80.2

The above statement, which is official and doubtless entirely correct, shows a difference in favor of the Niagara ship-canal route of $1 02 on a ton of wheat or flour from Chicago to New York.

Again this difference would be increased by the competition which always springs up between rival routes of trade, so that low freight would not be confined to this route, but all competing routes between the East and West would be obliged to reduce prices on through freight at least so as to conform to the cheaper channels, thus saving to the West annually millions of dollars, and to the East in the same ratio. As to the objection that trade through this canal would not stop at our ports, but move on to Montreal and be taken from our Atlantic cities, I would say that such has not been the fact thus far with reference to what has passed through the Welland canal to any considerable extent, for more than three quarters of it has found our sea-board through American channels and been consumed by our people or exported from our ports. Besides it would be more likely to go from us now than it would if we could furnish the facilities now furnished by Canada, and thus control to a greater extent than we now can the direction of our trade.

Again, it is objected that such a canal would deprive the State of New York of a large amount of tolls, which she would realize if the trade was forced through the whole length of her canals. It is impossible to force the trade against its interests; and it will go where the greatest inducements are held out to it. Besides, it would make no difference whatever, as I can see, for all the trade that an American ship-canal would get, if constructed, will be received by the Welland canal if ours be not constructed; and no condition of things could prevent it, as I can discover. It is simply a question whether we or Canada have the benefits of such a work and of such trade. The case must be met, and cannot be avoided. The issue is made up, and the result is an inevitable necessity.

I would be the last man to unnecessarily put myself in the way of the interests and prosperity of my State. I have stood by her interests always as best I was able. During three years in her Legislature, when her canal interests were on trial, and needed steadfast friends, and when, too, they were bitterly opposed, as they always were, by the party with which my colleague [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] has always acted, I had the honor to do all in my power toward permanently establishing them, and making them the pride and glory of our people.

And when they have been paid for by the business the great West has furnished, so that no part of the expense of their original construction and enlargement remains as a debt against the State, as the report of the canal board shows, especially so far as the main line is concerned, and when they are to-day worth all they ever cost, is it very generous in New York to say that no other channels shall be opened by which transportation will be cheapened unless tribute is paid to her? The West has done for New York all that New York has ever done for the West. The benefits are mutual.

But, sir, while I am jealous of the rights of my State, my duty now is here. I am to look over a larger field of operations, to take into my view our broad expanse of country, and in my action upon this as upon other great questions, consult the interests of all our people and all sections. It is a narrow policy, indeed, that would ask me to confine my action to the interests of my own State to the exclusion of all others, were it in my power to effect anything by it, which would not be possible in a body like this, representing such a variety of public interests, and all entitled to and able to command due consideration. I am in favor of developing all sections and interests of our broad country. Improvements of this nature should be aided by the Government, for they open communications with our people, bring them into a closer relationship, and tend to unite and bind together different sections of the country in a common interest. What vast wealth lies locked up in the earth, which industry and enterprise are fast developing, and when brought out to enrich and fill our land with plenty; what avenues of trade and commerce will be demanded to meet the necessities of the case! Railroads must be constructed to pierce our mountains and stretch across our boundless prairies; canals must connect our great rivers and lakes, those inland seas that make our continent a wonder and a marvel; and then, when the vast resources of the whole land shall be developed, and endless streams of wealth fill it with the fruits of such developments, we shall be able to fully realize our greatness and the magnitude of our resources.

All enterprises and projects that look to such results should receive the fostering care and aid of the Government. Every dollar and every acre of land given to such purposes is a rich investment for us, for they will bring back tenfold in due time to the whole people in the increased wealth and resources that will surely result from them. For New York or any of her Representatives to oppose this measure or throw any obstacles in the way of the completion of this grand work of improvement it is unwise, and such opposition is suicidal. Buffalo, so ably represented by my colleague on this floor, [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY,] has been the seat of all or nearly all the opposition that has been made to this measure from the State of New York. Now, sir, considered by itself alone, I would do nothing to strike at the interests of that great city, so filled with enterprise and worthy of the protection and admiration of all. I know of nothing upon which she is really unsound aside from this question of ship-canal, save it be at times her politics, but in this regard she gives occasionally some encouragement, for we see now and then signs of restored life and health, and it is to be hoped and believed that ere long she will stand upright, clothed, in her right mind, fully redeemed from all her past unfortunate errands and political degeneracy.

What enhances the interests and wealth of Buffalo and her people is gratifying to all our people, and especially to me and my constituents, for she sits like a queen upon the lake on the very border of my district, the most of which pays her constant tribute. She has no right, however, to hazard the best interests of the great whole for the purpose of aggrandizing herself, or to occupy such a selfish position as to advocate a policy that will cripple the vast interests of commerce generally so as to secure to herself a local benefit; and this applies equally to the whole State of New York. Such a course will in the end meet with a severe rebuke, for it cannot long withstand the broad and comprehensive policy of general advantage and public welfare which the great mass of our people will insist shall be adopted. Should the State of New York, or any portion of it, succeed in their opposition to this measure and the policy it is intended to secure, there will be brought about what in the end will be regretted. You will force the West and its trade through the Canadas by the present routes of communication and that to be completed, to wit, the Ottawa ship-canal, by which so many miles of transportation will be saved to reach New York, should the trade take that direction, and by which, without our own ship-canal, trade will inevitably be conducted by the St. Lawrence and out to the ocean without reaching our ports.

I call the attention of Representatives from New York, especially the city, from New England, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, to this fact, for it will be too late to consider it after such a condition of things takes place. The great West and Northwest must and will have ample outlets for her trade and articles of commerce. Not one acre in ten of the vast productive region of that mighty empire is yet under cultivation. Ten years hence she will raise one thousand million bushels of grain for market over her own consumption. Emigration is being quickened since the war, and all this vast country is to be filled up with industrious, producing classes that will develop its immense resources, now unknown, and pour into the channels of trade a constantly increasing amount of production. What is New York doing to meet this great demand? Where is this outlet to be found? While we are foolishly resisting one of the great measures to remedy the defect and meet the demands upon us, our Canadian neighbors, wiser than we, will present the facilities needed, and carry off the untold benefits of their skill and enterprise.

Surely the East is directly interested in this question. Her business men, her cities, her commerce, her consumers are all identified closely with this measure in their best and highest interests. The West, too, has a deep interest in this work. By carefully prepared estimates, which are entirely correct and official, which I have presented, it will be seen that by the ship-canal route, over one hundred and twenty miles of canal navigation will be saved from Chicago to New York, which, by taking into the account the difference between the cost of transportation on the lake and canal, and the further fact that the freight will be but a trifle if any more to Oswego than to Buffalo, we find that this route will cheapen the transportation on every bushel of wheat nearly four cents, which of itself is no small item for western men to examine in connection with this question. The same thing is true with reference to all articles of western production seeking our eastern markets.

Now, I submit whether this is not a measure that demands the serious attention of all sections, and claims an unqualified approval from Representatives of all portions of the country, for all are deeply interested in the general benefits to flow from its success. There are several outlets for the trade that reaches Lake Ontario: the Oswego and Erie canal, to Troy, and the Hudson river, besides two railroads at Syracuse, and another in contemplation; the Cape Vincent, the Rome and Watertown railroad, which now receives large consignments of lake produce, and delivers the same in New York by Central railroad, or Erie canal at Rome. The projected road from the Hudson to Lake Ontario, by the way of Saratoga, is being rapidly pushed forward, and will form another important avenue for western produce. The road from Ogdensburg to Boston is in successful operation, and supporting large lines of steamers in trade with the western States. By this route large amounts of produce are also sent to New York by way of Lake Champlain and canal. Other routes to the East are suggested and doubtless will be constructed, for the commercial energy of our people is unlimited, and will constantly increase as the demands for outlet increase. One of the most prominent is a water communication with the lakes, by way of a canal from Montreal, through Lake Champlain, and canal to the navigable waters of the Hudson, a distance of only sixty miles. But the success of all or any of these routes of communication, which are bound to be completed before very long, in which I insist the whole country is interested, depends entirely upon an opening between Lake Ontario and our western lakes by way of a ship-canal. There is no other as cheap, as proper, and as feasible. Shall we have it on the American side, or shall we continue to pay tribute to Canadian skill and enterprise? More than three quarters of all the commerce of the upper lakes is American, and hence it will be seen that we are keeping up the Welland canal by our enterprise and capital. We have paid for it and continually support it, and unless we move in the construction of a canal ourselves we shall furnish the means for its speedy enlargement and its continued support and prosperity.

But if the East and middle States will persist in their opposition to this measure, the West and Northwest will be compelled, and be justifiable, too, in making such arrangements as will meet their interests and take their immense surplus of productions by way of the Ottawa canal, to be constructed, to the St. Lawrence, and use that river as an easement to the ocean. I am glad that the West is so unanimously in favor of this measure, and hope that any unwise and selfish policy of any section may not lessen their devotion to the grand idea of developing our own resources by means of improvements like this within our own territory and under the control of our own people. Open up this connection between the lakes, and it will not be long before the New York canal, in her locks at least, will be enlarged to meet the demands upon them. Whether this canal be made or not, such an increase will be accomplished, but this is no reason why this work should not be done, as I have clearly shown, as all the additional facilities will be indispensable, and furnished from some quarter if not by us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House much longer than I had intended to do in this debate; but the question opens up such interesting fields of contemplation in connection with the future of our country, and the vast transactions of its future commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing prosperity and development, that I have been drawn further into the debate than perhaps prudence dictated.

Now, sir, when I look forward twenty and fifty years, which is but a span in the life of a nation like ours, and contemplate what our country is to be, in the light of the remarks made the other day by my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] I confess I am filled with pride and satisfaction.

All our broad expanse of country from ocean to ocean will be filled with free, intelligent, and enterprising people, living in and controlling States with institutions calculated to lift them up to the highest point of civilization, and fill our whole land with blessings and happiness. Railroads and canals, fostered and aided by the Government when and where necessary, reaching out their long lines across the continent, and interlocking with each other, ramifying in every direction, through every mountain pass, or piercing the mountain's side, along the rivers, over the prairies, upon the very thresholds of all our towns and cities, bringing ocean near to ocean and making near neighbors of the most remote sections of our united and happy land; all pouring into our Treasury untold wealth, and making us complete masters of the whole earth in every material point of view. What a sublime field for contemplation and thought! It remains to be seen whether we shall be worthy of such a destiny, whether we fully comprehend the duties of the hour, and whether we are ready to grasp the occasion and secure these great advantages.

Every such work as this bill proposes to authorize tends to bind our people together in a common interest, and adds one more link to the bond of union, and increases each man's capital stock in his country's good name and honor.

When our great and unequalled lines of communication are all opened between the Pacific and the Atlantic, Asia will be compelled to pay us tribute and send her products across our continent, through the Atlantic cities to their destination. It has been well said that "we are yet to dictate laws in the arts, sciences, and finance to the whole world, as well as be acknowledged the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing center of the whole earth." Among the means used to secure this grand result is the work proposed by this bill. It asks but a small favor compared with what has been granted and will yet be granted to other projects equally meritorious and worthy of consideration. The millions of money given to the Pacific railroad, for which I had the privilege of voting in the Thirty-Seventh Congress was a wise investment; and others of the same nature will do as much toward bringing about the condition of things to which I have referred. They develop, quicken, and push forward enterprise, labor, intelligence, and skill, all of which in their turn enrich and cover over our land with wealth and prosperity.

This work is entirely national in its character. We owe it to ourselves to aid in its construction, and thus secure it speedily. We owe it to the bold, enterprising men who have invested their property in commerce, and who are among the bravest of our people and the most patriotic of our citizens, that we open up this way of trade, and no longer compel them to pay tribute to those who have for us but little sympathy and respect, as the last few years of our trial have clearly shown. Our brave and loyal citizens engaged in service on our lakes ought not, any longer than it will take to construct our own ship-canal, be compelled to use theirs in the prosecution of their legitimate business; and Congress and the Government ought to give their early attention to the construction of the work that is now proposed. Like many other works of the past few years and present, it would stand as a monument to the intelligence, patriotism, and energy of the men and the Government who nobly came up to and met the struggles of the present day amid the darkest storms and greatest obstacles. It would be an honor to the age which witnesses its execution and a blessing to our whole people.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, from the cursory examination I have been able to give this measure, I am inclined to look upon it favorably. I have not examined the minutiae of the provisions of the bill, but the general objects which it contemplates are so different from those which ordinarily are presented for the consideration of this House that they certainly commend themselves to my judgment.

I regard this as a measure in the interest of peace, a measure in the interest of commerce, a measure in the interest of the prosperity of the whole country. It is not like many measures which have been pressed upon the consideration of this House during the last few months. It is not a measure to appropriate eleven or twelve million dollars for the purpose of feeding, clothing, and building school-houses for lazy, indolent negroes who will not work. It is nothing of the kind. It is not a measure for the purpose of raising the compensation of the heads of some of the bureaus who are hanging about at the skirt tail of members and of employés about this House, who beg to get into a public position, and who spend all the time afterward in trying to get their compensation increased.

I am aware at the threshold that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY] enunciates the grave doctrine to this House that this is an unconstitutional measure. My friend behind me says that that is a played-out question. I do not so regard it. I claim to be a strict constructionist of the Constitution. Still I do not believe in the doctrine that you can put your arms into the public Treasury and take millions of money from the people of the great West to expend upon the sea-board of the East, and that there is no constitutional right to make appropriations for the purpose of improving the great inland seas of the West.

The gentleman tells us that we are infringing upon the rights of New York, that we are going to take her precious soil without her consent. Why, sir, I suppose we would have to make a little hole in the rocks around the falls of Niagara. But that is not the secret of the gentleman's opposition to this bill. He tells us about the large expenditures that have been made at Buffalo in the way of warehouses for the purpose of taking charge of the products of the western country that are sent to the eastern market. He knows full well that thousands of his constituents live upon this business of transporting products from the West, reshipping them at Buffalo. That is the secret of his opposition to this bill.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that this is a measure that is in favor with the people. It is a measure in behalf of the toiling millions scattered throughout the length and breadth of our country, who do not throng the lobbies and ask for the passage of measures for their particular benefit. And now I want to see how the Representatives of the people will respond to this call that is made by their constituency at home with reference to this measure of great and paramount interest.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSS. For a question?

Mr. DELANO. It is not a question.

Mr. ROSS. I cannot yield; I have but a few minutes left. This is a measure in which the whole country is interested, unless it is the constituents of the gentleman from Buffalo, [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY,] who want to have a portion of the products of our farms stick to their hands in transit through the city of Buffalo. Why, sir, it reduces the price of the commodity to the consumer and it enhances it to the producer. It is mutual in its benefit.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELLIOT] yesterday gave us some valuable statistics in relation to the products of the great Northwest, especially of the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. But strange enough, after he had gone through with the advantages of navigation and pointed out the fact that we had to give three bushels of our corn to get one to market, he had nothing in his river and harbor bill for the improvement of the Illinois river, one of the great arteries which is necessary to complete this line of communication around the Niagara falls, so that the people of New England who have been fed on cod-fish and herring may be furnished with the corn, pork, and beef of the western States. [Laughter.]

Sir, in my judgment this is a measure that should commend itself to the House. It is said to be a war measure. Well, it may be necessary as a precautionary measure. It may be proper in view of the contingency of a war, but I do not regard it in that aspect. I am not in favor of the proposition now pending before the House to create a large standing army at enormous expense to the people. This is a very different measure. Gentlemen could vote this morning eleven or twelve millions for the Freedmen's Bureau easily enough, but when you ask for a loan of $6,000,000 to make a great national work in which the whole people, consumers and producers, are equally interested, constitutional objections spring up at once. My worthy friend from New York [Mr. WARD] wanted to strike out this appropriation of $6,000,000 for this great national work, but he had no objection to eleven or twelve millions for the Freedmen's Bureau.

If my friend from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] who has this bill in charge will only infuse a little vigor in it there will be no difficulty in its passing the House. But because it is a measure in behalf of the farmers, the producers and consumers of the country, I fear that it may receive the cold shoulder in this Congress. I trust that the time has come when those who represent the great Northwest, which has been talked so much about here, will come to the rescue of her interest, and show by their votes that they are in truth in favor of a measure of this character.

In my judgment, this will never be any burden upon the Treasury of the United States. If I understood the amendment which was offered this morning, it proposes that the Government shall receive ten per cent. of the gross earnings of this canal. If such is the case most unquestionably every one who is conversant with the vast amount of business which will necessarily be done upon a canal of this character will know that the Government will be amply remunerated for every dollar that it shall expend in aid of this work.

I know there are interests adverse to measures of this character. But they come from Buffalo; they come, perhaps, from interested individuals in the State of New York who desire to impede the commerce and trammel the prosperity of the country.

Mr. DRIGGS. I am disposed to favor this bill, for I regard this as a great national measure. I recollect that last year when the Government built one of the cutters ordered for the lakes, after it had been completed at Oswego, they were not allowed to take it through the Welland canal. I have only to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] that while he opposed the Northern Pacific railroad the other day because it passed through certain localities, he favors this one because he considers it may promote the interests of his own particular locality. I favor it, as I believe all the members from Michigan will do, because I consider it a great national measure.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN,] I will say that I am decidedly in favor of improving the great national highways of the country; and I deem the proposed canal by which it is proposed to avoid the obstructions of Niagara falls to be one of that character. I had at first intended to oppose this bill, because I am opposed to appropriation of moneys by Congress to the use and benefit of corporations. But a provision has been inserted in the bill by which Congress is empowered to regulate the rates of tolls and charges upon this proposed canal, to the end that to the extent of the contribution of the General Government this canal shall be free to the people of the United States. I shall therefore vote for the bill, and forego the opposition which I had intended to make to it.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS. I merely want to say that I regard this bill as constitutional, not under the war power particularly, but under the power in the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States. Although the proposed canal is entirely within the limits of one State, the commerce which it is to convey is between a great number of separate States; therefore I have no difficulty in overcoming any difficulty or scruple about internal improvements; especially when I find the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] overriding his old prejudices and his old constitutional objections against works of internal improvement by the General Government.

I shall go for this measure, as I did for one the other day which was intended to bring to the East the products of the great West. It will take some time to build this canal; and before it is built this great Northern Pacific railroad will have settled and brought under cultivation millions of acres of our land, which will send its produce down Lake Superior and the other great lakes, and there must be some outlet provided for it; for the canals now made cannot carry the present commerce of the country. And that railroad bill will pass before many days.

Now, I beseech the gentlemen from Illinois, who had such strong constitutional objections to the Pacific railroad bill, to give up their objections and go for this bill. And if we could persuade the members from Illinois and the members from Wisconsin and my friend who lives in Cleveland, that beautiful city upon the lakes, [Mr. SPALDING,] to give up their scruples, we might carry the bill through the House. I do pray that they will lay aside those prejudices that they will no longer exist. I am glad my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] who has just spoken has yielded his prejudices for a moment to the convincing argument of the gentleman upon the other side, [Mr. ROSS,] who seems to have forgotten his principles of yesterday. And I am glad that he has, and I only hope he will never remember them again. And I should be glad if my friend from the Pittsburg district [Mr. MOORHEAD] and others in his neighborhood would forego their prejudices and vote for this bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will.

Mr. STEVENS. He says he will. I tell you the millennium day is coming, [laughter;] blind eyes are opened, and deaf ears are unstopped, [renewed laughter,] and I do not know where this blaze of glory will end.

I know the gentleman from the Galena district [Mr. WASHBURN] would like to see this bill pass if it is likely to do any good. But his record is such that it is impossible for him to do anything but make a short speech against it. And if he should speak against it, it would be in a voice of thunder, denouncing the terrible extravagance of those who thus vote away the public money merely to improve the country for the present generation and for future ages.

I trust, sir, that this bill may pass. I support it with sincerity. I believe it contemplates a great and a good work. If it were defeated I should grieve, if it were only on account of the noble man who has it in charge and who never fails to act liberally.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, in view of what has just been said, it is perhaps proper that I should congratulate myself, in common with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

STEVENS]—and I believe we are the only two members of the House of whom this can be said—that we have not, upon this or any other subject, any prejudice whatever that we can be called upon to surrender. [A laugh.] Therefore we shall vote together on this bill.

He is situated somewhat differently from myself in this regard. I come from the city of New York, where, in common with the great portion of the northern Atlantic sea-board, our interest is to procure cheap food; and that will as time rolls on become more and more the great interest of all the northeastern States. On the contrary the interest of the great West, which is becoming more and more the grain-producing portion of this continent, is to obtain access to those who wish to purchase the food which the western States have to sell. This project is part of a grand scheme of works upon which this Congress must at some day or other enter, to facilitate communication between the grain-producing and the grain-consuming portions of this country. As a measure looking toward this great object I favor the bill now before us.

I beg leave to say, furthermore, that I shall, to the extent of my ability, favor every measure that may be brought before the House proposing to facilitate communication between the great West and the Atlantic sea-board, and falling within what I may deem the scope of the constitutional provisions on the subject. In my judgment the facilitating of all such communications, the cheapening of food for the East by opening communications with the markets of the great West, is hereafter to be one of the great works to which this Government is to give its attention.

The eastern portion of the country is drifting rapidly into the condition in which England found herself before the repeal of the corn laws. At the time of the adoption of the repealing act, her protective policy which she had pursued for centuries was abandoned under the pressure of the great and paramount necessity of obtaining cheap food for her people. That necessity broke down her prejudices, reversed her settled policy, and inaugurated an entire change in the whole course of her legislation. A similar occurrence must sooner or later take place with respect to the eastern portion of this continent.

Whatever, therefore, tends to facilitate communication between these two great sections of the country, tends to consolidate—not to reconstruct, for it is not needed in that regard, but to consolidate—the Union of the States, and make that Union perpetual, because it tends to make it one in interest, as it will be one in destiny.

I have not examined this bill, so far as its details are concerned, with any care; but I have the greatest confidence in the committee which has had it in charge, and in my colleague, [Mr. VAN HORN,] who has taken it under his particular supervision.

Mr. DELANO. As the gentleman says he has not examined the bill in its details, will he permit me to call his attention to one of its features?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. DELANO. Does the gentleman know how much money the bill proposes to take out of the Treasury?

Mr. RAYMOND. If I am correctly informed, it proposes to take no money out of the Treasury; but it proposes to lend the credit of the Government to the extent of $6,000,000; and I beg to say that I consider it in that regard the best appropriation of $6,000,000 upon which this Congress will be able to congratulate itself.

Mr. DELANO. Is the gentleman aware that one of the sections of the bill looks directly to the Government assuming the whole thing after the company has been permitted to go on borrowing at the rate of ten per cent. interest? Has the gentleman looked at the details of this monstrous measure at all? I do not believe he has; nor do I believe that the House understands what it is about to do in the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman's skepticism in regard to the extent of my knowledge may or may not be well founded. I say again, as I said before, that I have not considered the details of the bill; but my impression is that I am quite as well informed as the gentleman seems to be in regard to its general scope and bearing upon the present and future prosperity of the country. On this general conviction I am quite willing to act. I am responsible for no one's vote but my own, and that will be given most cheerfully for the passage of the bill.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I yield them to my colleague, [Mr. DODGE.]

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say in regard to this as a new work, that notwithstanding the fears of the canal commissioners of the State of New York, I shall vote cheerfully for the bill, because I believe the prosperity of the city and State of New York is identified with the prosperity of the West. I believe just in proportion as Illinois and the other western States are able to produce and get profits on their products, not to dispose of them merely at cost, but as they can make a profit on their productions, will they traffic with the city of New York, and use our canals and railroads so as to make them permanently prosperous. I shall vote for this bill under the firm conviction that the prosperity of the country is the prosperity of the city of New York.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, Mr. MILLER was granted leave to publish as part of the debates some remarks he had prepared on the pending measure. [The remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. DELANO. I move that the House do now adjourn. We have too thin a House to consider so important a measure.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the substitute of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, and it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DELANO moved that the bill be laid upon the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 85, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Benjamin, Bergen, Boyer, Buckland, Chanler, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrouner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Latham, Marvin, Niblack, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Shanklin, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Ward, Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Ailey, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashby, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brundage, Brownell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Defrees, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, Lavin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McKee, McKiernan, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Blow, Bromall, Bundy, Leader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Culver, Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, LeBlond, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Platts, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Rogers, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—66.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. COOK stated that he was paired with Mr. Blow, and that the latter would vote against the bill while he would vote for it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. MILLER, and that the latter would vote for the bill while he would vote against it.

Mr. GRINNELL stated that Mr. PRICE, who was absent by leave of the House, would, if present, have voted for the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR stated that Mr. THAYER, who would have voted against the bill, was paired with Mr. WENTWORTH, who would have voted for it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE stated he understood from Mr. ROGERS that he was paired with Mr. HULBURD.

Mr. HULBURD stated that he had reserved the right to vote on this bill.

Mr. CHANLER stated that his colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, was paired with Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, the title was amended so as to read, "A bill to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 238, to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 197, to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NIBLACK asked and obtained further leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. KERR, for one week.

Mr. GRINNELL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. PRICE for one week.

BARRY AND HIGGINS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Barry & Higgins; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMERICAN REGISTERS.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to grant American registers to certain vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

A. SHERWOOD.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund money paid by A. Sherwood, and others, for duties improperly collected; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

POST-ROUTE BRIDGES.

On motion of Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, Senate bill No. 236, to authorize the construction of certain bridges and their establishment as post routes, was taken from the Speaker's table, and ordered to be printed.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to carry into immediate effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, and asked its consideration at the present time.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ELDRIDGE: The petition of Allen Pierce, for amendment of the Constitution so as to provide that the President and Vice President shall hold their offices twenty years, &c.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of Hon. L. W. Lawrence, and others, citizens of Boone county, Illinois, for increased duties upon wool.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The memorial of several New York and Connecticut manufacturers of sheet-brass, brass and copper wire, and German silver, asking for increased protection.

Also, the petition of 75 citizens of Portage county, Ohio, asking for increased protection to American wool.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: A memorial for survey of a canal to connect Rock river and Lake Michigan.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of Henry Ten Eyck, and others, citizens of Madison county, New York, for increase of tariff on wool.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of 73 citizens of Randolph county, Indiana, praying an amendment of the Federal Constitution prohibiting any distinction among citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or descent.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of J. J. Giers, and others, citizens of Alabama, praying Congress for immediate relief for the destitute and suffering poor of the mountain district of that State.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of S. R. Batchellor, and others, citizens of West Brantree, Vermont, praying for increased protection on wool.

By Mr. RAYMOND: Joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the passage of a bill to equalize bounties paid to soldiers.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of citizens of Wirt, Alleghany county, New York, in favor of increasing the tariff on wool.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask leave to present the petition of William Johnson. It appears that this petitioner, who is described in his military papers as a man of dark complexion, with black hair and eyes, enlisted as a private in the fourteenth regiment of New York heavy artillery, and served as a private until his regiment was mustered out. He was mustered out with the regiment, but he was paid only seven dollars a month, being treated by the officers of the Government as a colored man. He now asks that an act of Congress may be passed giving him the same pay as other privates of his regiment. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Ezra Carter, jr., late collector of the customs of the district of Portland and Falmouth, praying to be allowed a balance due him on account of certain moneys expended for repairs to the custom house, the vouchers for which were destroyed by fire; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented ten petitions numerously signed by producers, traders, and operators of the oil regions of Pennsylvania, representing that the tax on crude petroleum is oppressive, impolitic, and unjust, and in its operations is fast crushing out all new developments of territory, closing up wells of moderate yield, and paralyzing every branch of business in that section of country, and praying that the tax may be repealed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Washington Crosland for compensation for losses accruing from the seizure and use of his property by the Government of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That C. C. Hutchinson have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Eli W. Goff, praying for compensation for property rescued from him while inspector of customs for the district of Vermont, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 281) to authorize the Chesapeake Bay and Potomac River Tide-Water Canal Company to enter the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 473) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 498) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of unmarried daughters of revolutionary soldiers, praying that they may be granted the same pension that was received by their mothers while living, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Secretary of State, and papers relative to the claim on the Government by the owners of the British vessel Magicienne, reported a bill (S. No. 297) for the relief of the owners of the British vessel Magicienne; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 75) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia," &c., and for other purposes, to report that they have had it under consideration and are of opinion that it should not pass. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) to refer the claim of the administrator of Richard W. Meade, deceased, to the Court of Claims, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of A. L. Fleury, praying for the appointment of a commission to visit London to investigate the invention of the so-called Zopissa board with a view of purchasing that invention for the use of the United States Government, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 246) relating to public schools in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 183) concerning the fire department of Washington city, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congressional Society of Washington, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 264) to grant certain privileges to the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 247) donating certain lots in the city of Washington for schools for colored children, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for an appropriation for the establishment of an industrial normal school and farm and workshops in the District of Columbia for the education of competent teachers in agriculture and the mechanic arts, have instructed me to report that legislation is inexpedient; and I move that the petition be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Jane D. Brent, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 298) granting a pension to Jane D. Brent. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Jane E. Miles, widow of William D. Miles, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 299) granting a pension to Jane E. Miles. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

REPORT RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims on the petition of Sarah L. Spring and Harriet Spring, of Waterville, Maine, heirs of Captain William Barker, deceased, of the continental establishment of the revolutionary army, praying Congress to grant to them the pension that their grandfather would have drawn from the time of his discharge to the time of his death, or the half pay, with interest thereon, to which he was entitled by law, be recommended to that committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 301) regulating the service of final process in suits at law and of orders and decrees in equity of courts of the United States in places out of their jurisdictional limits; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GUTHRIE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) to provide for codifying the laws relating to the customs; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GUTHRIE. When I was in the Treasury Department I reported to Congress a codification of the revenue laws. I deemed it necessary at that time, but Congress did not act on it. It lies in the Treasury yet unacted upon and undisposed of. In a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury, this resolution was prepared, and I know he is anxious to have the benefit of such a codification. I propose to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce in order that they may consider the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. CLARK. There are several bills and orders upon the Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims have asked of the Senate no time in regard to these matters during the present session; and I propose to ask of the Senate a little time on Friday next, if they will give it to me, to consider some matters reported from the Committee on Claims. Friday used to be a day set apart every week for the consideration of private claims, and I now propose to ask a little time next Friday, if the Senate will allow it.

FUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 300) to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before this bill is referred I desire to make a statement as to some of the provisions of this bill for public information. It provides in the usual form for a five per cent. thirty-year loan, to be called the consolidated debt of the United States, and to be disposed of at not less than par, and to be applied to the payment of the existing national debt other than United States notes commonly known as greenbacks. There are two provisions of the bill likely to excite opposition, one of which grows out of the question of taxing property in United States securities. It cannot be denied that a strong feeling grows out of the exemption from State taxation of so large an amount of property, and various propositions have been made to subject them to increased taxation by the United States. While they bear interest at a rate equal to that allowed in most of the States on notes and securities subject to tax, this feeling of inequality will continue and increase. They are now subject to income tax levied by the United States, but owing to the $600 exemption, now proposed to be increased to $1,000, and also to the large amount held abroad which cannot be reached, and the readiness with which the tax is evaded, it yields to the United States less than one tenth of one per cent. on the aggregate debt. In consideration of the voluntary reduction in the rate of interest from six and seven and three tenths per cent. to five per cent., this bill proposes to extend the present exemption from State taxation to the income tax, and will in effect secure to the United States a reduction of one sixth of the present interest paid, with but the trifling loss of the income tax. The saving thus made, with a further sum, sufficient annually to amount to thirty millions, it is proposed to apply to the payment of the principal of the debt. If uninterrupted this will be accomplished in thirty-five years. The effect is to pay the national debt by the saving of interest.

The second provision grows out of the option given to the holders of the seven and three tenths notes to demand payment in money at their maturity in five-thirty bonds. This option will compel the Secretary to accumulate vast sums for a contingency that may not happen, and place him at the mercy of sudden contractions whenever the notes mature, as they do in large sums at specified dates. To avoid this, this bill applies the common custom and law of requiring a reasonable notice by the holders of this option. The same principle was applied to the option in the demand notes of 1862, and to an ordinary hiring of a house or a servant from year to year. If no option is taken then it is held to be a choice of money, and the Secretary will have six months to prepare for it.

I will not discuss the bill further. It is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and has been partially considered by the Committee on Finance. It will be objected that the holders of the present bonds will not convert them, but fortunately nearly all our securities will soon be within our reach by maturity. And it is the confident belief that this clean loan on a reduced rate of interest will be so fair an adjustment between the conflicting interests of the bond-holders and tax-payers that it will be accepted by both, and thus represent the consolidated debt of the United States. All the advantages proposed by the bill will be more properly considered when it is reported to the Senate. In the mean time it is but right to submit it to the impartial test of the public judgment, for it affects the interest of every one who pays taxes or holds national securities.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask leave to introduce at this time, for the purpose of having it printed, an amendment to the bill (S. No. 292) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out section one of the bill and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That whenever any one of the States lately in insurrection shall ratify the above proposed amendment, as required by the Constitution of the United States, and shall conform its constitution and laws thereto, the Senators and Representatives from such State, after the 4th day of March, 1867, if found duly elected and qualified, shall, upon taking the required oath, be admitted into Congress: Provided, That Senators and Representatives from Tennessee and Arkansas, respectively, shall be admitted, if elected and qualified as aforesaid, when either of said States shall ratify, as aforesaid, said proposed amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I beg permission to say that this amendment embodies the views I presented to the committee, and I introduce it at this time so that it may be printed and examined before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the bill. I invite attention to the fact that by this amendment Senators and Representatives from the so-called confederate States are not allowed to take their seats in Congress until the 4th day of March, 1867, with the exception of Tennessee and Arkansas, giving the loyal States an opportunity, if they desire so to do, to make the proposed constitutional amendment a part of the Constitution of the United States before that time. Should the loyal States adopt that amendment, I have little doubt that it would be adopted by enough of the other States to make it a part of the Constitution before the 4th of March, 1867; but if the loyal States should refuse to adopt the amendment and say that they do not want the guarantees and security for which it provides, then, so far as I am advised at present, I can see no good reason for refusing any longer to receive representation from these insurgent States. Tennessee and Arkansas are made exceptions. Their Senators and Representatives are to be received as soon as they ratify this constitutional amendment; and I believe, from the condition of their people and the character of their constitutions and laws, that they are entitled to a precedence over the other States that have been in rebellion. I believe that this amendment is better in all respects than the original section; but if the Senate, after consideration, decides otherwise, I shall cheerfully acquiesce in its judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask leave to give notice of my intention to offer, by way of amendment to the bill and resolutions reported by the joint committee on reconstruction, and as a substitute therefor, the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the interests of peace and the interests of the Union require the admission of every State to its share in public legislation whenever it presents itself, not only in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, but in the persons of representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under any constitutional or legal test.

I ask the consent of the Senate to say a few words in explanation of my views on the subject.

What the country expected from Congress was a practical scheme for hastening the reestablishment of all the States in their full constitutional relations. This report produces a plan which must inevitably put off this end, so strongly desired and demanded. Does any one believe that the southern States will accept the proposed constitutional amendment? Certainly they will decline. They will say, "Let us see what the next elections in the North develop. This Congress may recommend the amendment; the next Congress, which is to be chosen in the fall of the present year, and which may meet on the 5th of March, 1867, may be of a different mind. It may repeal all that this Congress has enacted; we had better wait."

The "restoration of the States to their practical relations in the Union," as Mr. Lincoln happily phrased it, is therefore put off, if this report is accepted, for at least another year; and the practical result of the labors of the reconstruction committee will be to have made up a platform on which those who choose to stand upon it may go before the country at the fall election. That is all; and in our judgment that is not enough to satisfy the country.

It is hardly worth while to discuss the merits of measures which to be valid must be accepted by communities which are sure to reject them; but we may remark that it is not probable so heavily taxed and so poor a people as those of the southern States will assume the payment of the enormous and wastefully contracted rebel debt, and that no party would ever dare to go before the people of this country with a proposition for the United States to assume this debt, whose certificates are held chiefly by foreign speculators upon our national ruin. Further, that it is scarcely probable the people who have a majority in the South will voluntarily disfranchise themselves; and that the extremes to which partisan passions have been inflamed in Tennessee by the disfranchisement of the greater part of the population there, does not encourage practical men to look for the fruits of peace from such a policy enforced elsewhere.

Even the reconstruction committee acknowledge that "it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights." Now, what have we already to "secure future peace and safety?" In the first place, we have the civil rights act, under which any citizen who is denied justice by local or State courts is empowered to appeal to the United States court, which is commanded, with all its machinery, to interfere in his behalf, and if necessary, to use the military power of the United States to secure him justice. Surely no citizen need suffer wrong while this act remains. In the next place, we have a form of oath, prescribed by Congress; which makes it impossible for any one who voluntarily engaged in rebellion to enter Congress or to hold any Federal office without committing perjury, for which he may and ought to be indicted and punished. Finally, we have the Freedmen's Bureau for a whole year, during which, with a wise and conciliatory policy, we may hope the labor question in the South will assume something of its normal condition.

But let us not forget, on the other hand, the dangers which attend impracticable measures. Suppose, going before the people on this platform, built by the congressional committee, we are beaten. In that event we may be sure that the next Congress will not only refuse to make the demands which this one makes, but it will most probably repeal the civil rights act and the test oath; and thus our own imprudence will have sacrificed the great objects we have already gained.

The amendment proposed is right enough, if the reconstruction committee can get any southern State to accept it. But unless they do so, it is of course only a shot in the air, which may be right and true, but will hit nowhere—unless indeed it falls upon the heads of the gunners. Is it not far wiser for Congress to make sure of what it has done; to cry "Enough for this time;" to be content that it has secured the supremacy of law and justice in all our territory; and to admit at once to their seats all Representatives and Senators who can take the prescribed oaths?

One Congress cannot bring about the millennium; there are years to come in which we may all join upon a platform of larger liberty, and argue the questions and urge the reforms which still remain. For this time we have reason to be content; for we have put down armed resistance to the laws, and Congress has given us, in the civil rights act, a guarantee for free speech in every part of the Union. It is our own fault if, having thus secured the right to argue, we do not enlighten prejudice and mere opposition, and show that equal liberty is the best for all.

What I have read seems to me so wise and just, that I have adopted it as the best expression which I can make of my own views. It is the leading editorial article in the New York Evening Post of May 1, a journal which certainly is not excelled in ability, patriotism, and influence by any newspaper in this country. Coming from such a source, I cannot but hope that these wise, calm, and statesmanlike views may have some influence even in this body, as they certainly will have among the intelligent people of the United States. They express, in my judgment, the calm and resolute convictions of thinking men, and will, so soon as public opinion can legitimately declare itself, take the form and be clothed with the authority of public law.

Leave was granted to introduce the joint resolution (S. R. No. 81) providing for the representation of the several States in the Congress of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make a single remark upon the proposition of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. He thinks that the remarks which he read from the New York Evening Post are so very wise, so very just, that he has some hope, to use his own language, that they may not be without their effect even upon the members of this body; thus, I suppose, intending to intimate that the last place where wise and just views could be expected to have any effect would be upon the members of this body. Sir, we have not given ourselves over to the keeping of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, or those who act with him. We do not pretend to any very particular wisdom or any particular sense of justice; but we who were on the joint committee of fifteen, and who are most immediately touched by the remark, feel that at any rate we have tried to do our duty. We have been in session a considerable length of time but not longer than we deemed it absolutely necessary in order to reach a conclusion, and in reaching that conclusion we have been obliged to take into consideration a great many things: first, what it would be wise and just to do, and next what, if it is wise and just, we can do; what would be acceptable in the first place to Congress, and in the next place what would be acceptable to the people. Unquestionably in the committee there was very considerable difference of opinion. That difference of opinion had to be reconciled. I do not suppose that the scheme as presented would be exactly in all particulars what would suit perhaps a large number; but the question is one beyond mere personal opinion, and mere adherence to personal opinion or personal feeling; and the committee, after much deliberation, came to the conclusion that its duty was to agree upon that which seemed to be the best scheme with regard to reconstruction upon which they could come to a unanimous or nearly unanimous agreement.

The proposition made by the honorable Senator from Oregon this morning would indicate, for instance, that he is not exactly satisfied with the result to which the committee came. I really, with all respect to my friend from Oregon, beg leave to say that when a committee after great deliberation has come to a conclusion upon a subject which has been assented to and reported, at any rate the members of the committee should abstain from pressing individual views in advance of the general action of the body to which the report has been made, because it has a tendency to weaken the effect of the report itself.

I accede to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Connecticut with regard to the eminent standing of the press from which he has read; but, eminent as it is, I think it is not immodest on the part of the committee of fifteen, selected with very considerable care, and, with one exception, perhaps, composed of gentlemen eminently fitted for the position which was assigned to them, to suppose that after months of deliberation, after great study and reflection, after careful examination of the evidence before them, not only as to what was wise to do, but as to what could be done, the united opinions of a very large majority of them might be supposed to come about as near the right as the opinion of an individual who may happen to write in the columns of a newspaper. I acknowledge, as a general rule, that the editor of a newspaper knows by intuition far more of the state of the country and what is wise to be done, no matter what his age, or what his position, than Congress can possibly know; but I think, at any rate, a little faith should be given to a committee of Congress, so large as this committee, and to Congress itself, devoting itself carefully to the study of the great questions on which it proposes to act. I cannot agree with my honorable friend from Connecticut, that because the opinions which he read happen to appear in a press of character they are therefore so conclusive as at once to overturn all the conclusions to which, after much deliberation, the committee have arrived. At any rate I shall beg leave to ask, when the proper time comes, for the careful consideration of the Senate of all these important questions; and having no pride of opinion on the subject, if Congress shall come to the conclusion that the scheme which has been presented needs amendment and alteration, I shall submit with perfect willingness and perfect contentment, in the hope that something wiser and better will be reached; but until we come to the discussion I am unwilling to admit, even upon the authority of the New York Evening Post, that what we have done cannot be acceptable to the people of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. I suppose the Senator from Maine did not intend, in his opening remarks, to question my right to offer the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all; I only suggested to the Senator that when he stated that the wisdom of those remarks of the Post might, he hoped, have some effect even upon this body, it was rather an intimation that this body could not be expected to act wisely and justly.

Mr. DIXON. The word "even," as used by me, may have, I think, a different meaning from what the Senator supposes. My meaning was that those remarks ought to have influence, even upon so distinguished and so wise a body as this; but I will consent to strike out the word "even," if it is offensive to the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. DIXON. I meant to say, and I now repeat, that even in such a body as the Senate of the United States, words of wisdom like these might have their effect. I certainly would be the last person to reflect on the Senate, or to reflect on the committee, but I suppose I have a right to say that I do not think the report of the committee contains all the wisdom which even may exist in the Senate or in the committee itself.

Now, Mr. President, I beg leave to say a word with regard to that report and the measure which the committee have proposed. But for my great respect for the members of that committee and its chairman, and were I not forbidden by my knowledge that they are incapable of such a thing, from the bare reading of their reported propositions I should suppose that, as this writer intimates, whose language I have adopted, the object of the report was to present a scheme which could not be accepted. I am forbidden to entertain such an opinion by my great respect for the committee. I know they are incapable of anything of that sort, and I therefore am obliged to suppose that they thought this might be accepted, that it might possibly, under some supposable circumstances, calm the agitation which is prevailing on this subject, and result in the readmission of members from the late rebel States. That, no doubt, was their intention; but I beg leave to say that it seems to me that it is utterly impossible that that should ever be the effect of it. For example, allow me to particularize. After the States have accepted these terms, after they are represented in this body and in the House of Representatives for a period of nearly four years, if they accept the proposition next fall, they are to be denied the right of voting for their own Representatives in Congress; for we are told every day, and I believe it is to a certain extent true in some States, that the whole mass of the people participated in the rebellion, or at least, in the language of the report, "adhered" to it. The language of the report does not exclude merely those who were original conspirators, but all who may finally have adhered to the rebellion. Now, consider that proposition for a moment. These States are to be represented in the other House and in this body after having accepted these terms, and still their representatives are to be chosen without the votes of the people. I would ask, who is to vote? The colored men cannot vote. Take South Carolina or Mississippi or Georgia. Who is to choose Representatives in those States? I will not say it is a mockery, because my respect for the committee forbids; but I must say that it does seem to me that no man can expect that any of these States will ever accept the terms proposed. I agree with the Evening Post on that point. I will say further that I am not sure, if they would accept it, they ever ought to be permitted to vote at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I have the impression that President Johnson has said, over and over again, that the government of these States ought to be exercised by the loyal portion, those who had been loyal to the Union.

Mr. DIXON. In the first place, I beg leave to say to the Senator from Maine that it makes no difference to me, in forming my opinions, what the President or any other man says. If the President had said so, it would not be of binding authority on me, unless my judgment approved it. In the next place, I say that I agree with the sentiment, not because the President said it, but because I believe it is a true and correct sentiment. But that is not what the report says. The report of the committee does not say that only loyal men can vote. I know the President says that; everybody says it who thinks as I do; but the question is, what is a loyal man?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did he not say those who had been loyal, those who had not participated in the rebellion, should be those intrusted with the Government? Was not that his recommendation in regard to Tennessee?

Mr. DIXON. When these States are again regarded as members of the Union, if they accept the terms of readmission proposed to them, all loyal men at the time ought to be permitted to vote. I will not say that the exception made in one clause of the report is not correct, that certain leaders be disfranchised; but I say that to disfranchise a whole people, to tell them that they may send members to Congress and still shall not vote for them—for that is the result of it—to say, "You may be represented, but you shall not vote," seems a mockery. Under it there might hardly be twenty voters, possibly, in a State.

Mr. President, why did I read the article from the New York Evening Post? Not as an authority. It struck me that the views were so correct and so sound that I desired to adopt them as my own, and I was very certain that the source from which those ideas came would have great weight with the loyal people of this country, and properly so; that that paper had a character for loyalty and for patriotism and for ability and for honesty and integrity which gave it weight; that what came from the distinguished and venerable editor of that paper was entitled to weight, even in the Senate of the United States, and therefore I read the article and adopted its language.

I have only one word more to say. I am extremely desirous—no man can be more desirous than I am—to unite upon some plan which shall pacify the country, and which shall restore and reconstruct the Union. I had hoped this committee would propose something which would accomplish that. As to the plan proposed, I am utterly hopeless with regard to its producing any good effect. I may be mistaken. I have the highest respect, I need not say, for the members of the committee. I know they are patriotic; but I think they are utterly mistaken, and I think I have the right to say it, in all respect to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Connecticut has gone into a discussion of the merits of the report. I said nothing of the merits of the report. I did not intend to say anything, and I do not now, on that subject. I merely rise to say that I choose to avoid anything of that description until the report comes properly before the Senate, when, if I have sufficient strength, I shall endeavor to explain the views of the committee upon that subject so far as it may become my duty to explain them. In the mean time I suppose we are to have gentlemen giving us the opinions, which I think we can find out for ourselves, of different persons throughout the country. I wish only to say that, notwithstanding my respect for each and all of those who may choose to instruct us on the subject, we have a duty to discharge, and must discharge it in the best way we can upon our own views and sentiments as to what the condition of the country demands.

Mr. GRIMES. There seems to be some controversy between the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Maine as to what are, at this time, the opinions of the President of the United States; and occupying the peculiar relations which the Senator from Connecticut does to the Chief Magistrate of the country, I desire to refer, as he has done, to a newspaper, one published in this city, purporting to give the last revised opinions of the President, and to inquire of him whether or not they are authentic. I hold in my hand the National Intelligencer of this morning, which contains an article represented to me to have been telegraphed from the precincts of the White House to the various newspapers in the country, headed, "The President and his Cabinet in Council."

"It is understood that at the Cabinet meeting yesterday the President invited an expression of opinion from the heads of Departments respecting the propositions reported on Monday last by the congressional committee on reconstruction. An interesting and animated discussion is said to have ensued, in the course of which, if rumor be true, Secretary Seward declared himself in very decided and emphatic terms against the plan of the committee and in favor of the immediate admission of loyal representatives from the lately rebellious States.

"Secretary McCulloch was as positive as the Secretary of State in his opposition to the plan recommended by the committee, and expressed himself strongly in favor of an immediate consummation of the President's restoration policy by the admission into Congress of loyal men from the southern States.

"Secretary Stanton was equally decided in his opposition to the committee's propositions, was for adhering to the policy which had been agreed upon and consistently pursued by the Administration, and was gratified that the President had brought the subject to the consideration of the Cabinet.

"Secretary Welles was unequivocally against the committee's scheme, and his support of the President's policy, comprehending the instant admission into Congress of loyal representatives from the States lately in rebellion.

"Secretary Harlan was rather reticent, and expressed no opinion.

"Postmaster General Dennison was in favor of carrying out the restoration policy of the President, but expressed some doubts as to the precise time at which loyal representatives from the southern States should be admitted to seats in Congress.

"Attorney General Speed was not present at the meeting, being on a visit to his home in Kentucky.

"The President was earnest in his opposition to the report of the committee, and declared himself against all conditions precedent to the admission of loyal representatives from the southern States in the shape of amendments to the Constitution or the passage of laws. He insisted that under the Constitution no State could be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate, and that Senators and Representatives ought to be at once admitted into the respective Houses, as prescribed by law and the Constitution. He was for a rigid adherence to the Constitution as it is, and remarked that, having sustained ourselves under it during a terrible rebellion, he thought that the Government could be restored without a resort to amendments. He remarked in general terms that if the organic law is to be changed at all, it should be at a time when all the States and all the people can participate in the alteration."

Now, Mr. President, if I understand the force of language, that is not the position that the President of the United States has hitherto occupied. If I understand it—and perhaps the Senator from Connecticut can set me right if I am in error—the President of the United States now insists that these States shall be immediately represented; that they are entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to immediate representation in the Senate and House of Representatives without any antecedent conditions, and the most of his Cabinet concur in that opinion. I suppose that this is the antagonist proposition that is put forth from the White House in opposition to the report of the committee of fifteen, commonly called the committee on reconstruction—the immediate unconditional admission, without any terms, without any conditions, of the representatives of those States and of the people of those States.

Mr. SUMNER obtained the floor.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment to reply to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Iowa intimated in his opening remarks that I had some peculiar knowledge or means of knowledge of the President's views. He spoke of the "peculiar relations" in which I stand to the President. The Senator is entirely mistaken in regard to that. My relations to the President are precisely similar to those of the Senator himself. I have seen the President but once within the space of two months, and then for not over five minutes. I take his views from his written, published statements.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator will excuse me, the fact that the Senator's resolution was identical in spirit and almost in terms with the language attributed in the National Intelligence of this morning to the President led me to infer—

Mr. DIXON. If it is identical in spirit, then the Senator is mistaken in another point when he says that the President has now taken new views and new grounds. He says that the language attributed to the President in the paper from which he has read, is identical in spirit with the resolution that I have offered. My resolution is taken from the President's veto message of the Freedmen's Bureau bill more than two months ago; so that the Senator will see that he is mistaken in supposing that there has been any change in the President's views, if mine are identical with his; and I do not suppose there has been any change. I do not suppose that the President has changed from the views contained in that resolution. I copied the resolution from the words of the President contained in that veto message because I thought they were extremely well expressed and because they were my views.

Now, I desire to say with regard to this resolution of mine, that I have not offered it in consequence of any consultation with any human being. I have not seen the President or any member of the Cabinet or any human being with regard to it. I read the article in the Evening Post, and it struck me as being true and as coming from a source entitling it to great weight and authority. I knew it would be respected by this body from the character of the writer. I thought it correct, and it was exactly in accordance with my sentiments.

I say this because it might possibly be supposed from what the Senator said that this resolution of mine has been offered in consequence of some consultation. Sir, I am in consultation with nobody. I attempt to act here as a Senator in accordance with my own views of right. I may be wrong; but I am under the lead of no master and no man. I care not what the President or anybody else thinks. If what he does and says is right, I support him; if they are wrong, I denounce him. That, I take it, is the position of every Senator. No man is worthy of being a Senator unless that is his position. I repeat that I have offered this resolution without consultation with anybody.

Now, a single word as to the President's views. I do not see that there is any very great contradiction. It cannot be supposed that the President will in every statement which he makes of his views express every single shade of idea that he may have heretofore expressed. He thinks that the southern States should be represented. How and by whom? Take all his language together, and it is by loyal men when they come here in an attitude of harmony and loyalty to the Government and are represented by loyal men. That is what my resolution says; that is what the President says, and I believe that is his view.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not intend to convey the idea that the Senator from Connecticut has a master; but I submit, after all he has said, that I was perfectly justified in saying that peculiar relations subsisted between him and the President, when he himself admits that he went, not only for the spirit, but for the identical language of his resolution, to the celebrated veto message of the President of the United States on the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

Mr. DIXON. It is no uncommon thing for a resolution to be offered in language taken from a message of the President of the United States. It is frequently done, and it is very proper, as it strikes me. In some remarks that I had the honor of making about two months ago in the Senate, I embodied that extract from the message of the President as the expression of my own views. I then said that I thought it was right, and I have now offered it in the form of a resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. When I rose a moment ago I intended to make a remark in reply to the Senator from Connecticut, but the question seems to have drifted out of sight. I will observe, however, that the question involved in his proposition is so important that I never regret—

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know if the unfinished business does not come up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to remark that the morning hour has expired, and it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to allowing the special order to pass over informally for a few moments to afford Senators an opportunity to make explanations on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day can only be laid aside by unanimous consent. No objection being made, it is laid aside informally.

Mr. SUMNER. I was about to say that the proposition involved in the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut is so important that it may be considered as perhaps always in order to discuss it. I do not know that we ought to pass a day without discussing it in some way. I certainly do not deprecate this discussion; but while I say that, I am very positive on another point: I should deprecate any effort now to precipitate a decision on that question; and I most sincerely hope that the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee on reconstruction, who has this matter in charge, will bear that in mind. I do not believe that Congress at this moment is in a condition to give the country the best proposition on this important subject. I am afraid that that excellent committee has listened too much to voices from without, insisting that there must be an issue presented to the country. For myself, I have always thought that that call was premature. There is no occasion now for an issue to be presented to the country. There are no elections in any States. The election in Connecticut is over. The election in New Hampshire is over. There are to be no elections before next autumn. What is the occasion, then, for an issue to be presented to the country? I see none, unless Congress, after a most careful and mature discussion of the whole subject, is able to present an issue on which we can all honestly and as one phalanx go forward to battle.

I do not intend to be drawn into a premature discussion of the issue presented by the report of the committee on reconstruction. I merely speak now to the question of time. I am sure that that report could not have been made in the last week of March. I am equally sure that if the committee had postponed their report until the last week of May they would have made a better one than they have made in the last week of April. I hope, therefore, following out that idea, that all decision of this question will be postponed as long as possible, to the end that all just influences may come to Congress from the country, and that Congress itself may be inspired by the fullest and amplest consideration of the whole question.

Why, sir, there is the evidence which has been laid before this committee. We have not yet seen it together. That evidence ought to be together; it ought to be laid before the whole country; and we ought to have returning to us from the country the just influence which the circulation of that evidence is calculated to cause. I am sure that wherever that evidence is read the people will say Congress is justified in insisting upon security for the future. To that end, I take it, the evidence was taken, and I hope that Congress will not act until we get the natural and legitimate influences from that evidence.

But, sir, allow me to say, by way of comment on the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut, that it seems to me my excellent friend, when he brought forward his proposition, forgot two things.

Mr. DIXON. Probably more than that.

Mr. SUMNER. He says probably more than that; but the two things he forgot were so great, so essential, that to forget them was to forget everything. In the first place, he forgot that we had been in a war; and in the second place, he forgot that four million human beings had been changed from a condition of slavery to freedom. Those two great ruling facts my excellent friend forgot, evidently, when he drew up his proposition. He forgot that we had been in a war, because he fails to make any provision for that security which common sense and common prudence, the law of nations, and every instinct of the human heart require should be made. He provides no guarantee. Sir, the essential thing, at this moment, is a guarantee. The Senator abandons that; but it is because he forgets that we have been in a war. If I, like the Senator from Connecticut, could forget this terrible war, with all the blood and treasure that it has cost us, I, too, could forget the guarantees; but as that war is always in my mind, the Senator will pardon me if I insist that we shall have guarantees.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SUMNER. In one moment I shall have done. In the second place, I have said that my excellent friend forgets that four million human beings have been changed in their condition. Four million slaves have been declared to be freemen; and by whom, and by what power? By the national Government; and let me say that, as the national Government gave that freedom, it belongs to the national Government to secure it. The national Government cannot leave those men whom it has made free to the guardianship or custody or tender mercies of any other government. It is bound to take them into its own keeping, to surround them all by its own protecting power, and invest them with all the rights and conditions which in the exercise of its best judgment shall seem necessary to that end. All that my excellent friend has absolutely forgotten. It is not in his mind. If I could bring myself to such an obliviousness, if I could bathe so completely in the waters of Lethe as my excellent friend from Connecticut seems to have done daily in these recent times, I could join him in the support of his proposition.

Mr. DIXON. One word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, with the consent of the Senate. The Senator says that I have forgotten many things, and among others the guarantees required by the four million slaves who have been emancipated. I desire to ask the Senator what guarantee those persons have in the proposition reported by the committee. The Senator exhausted all the terms of opprobrium in the English language in denouncing a resolution which was before the Senate some time since, and which contained the only guarantee for the colored race that is contained in this report. The only guarantee which he says he keeps constantly in his mind, and which I have forgotten, contained in this report is that providing that if those persons are not allowed to vote in the States in which they reside they shall not be counted in the apportionment of Representatives. The Senate has not yet forgotten—the echoes are still ringing in this Hall—what the Senator said in regard to that proposition. If the English language contains any term of reproach, if it can be coined into any form or shape of opprobrium which he did not exhaust on that subject, and some of which my friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] cited as beauties of rhetoric, I am mistaken. I think he could have gone no further in denouncing that very proposition which is the only guarantee in this report; and yet he says I have forgotten that they require guarantees. I beg leave to remind the Senator that he too has forgotten his own words on that subject.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all.

The resolution of Mr. DIXON was ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES TO COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the laws so as to enable back pay and bounty due to colored soldiers for services in the late war to be drawn upon the same proof of marriage as is now required for the collection of pensions due to such soldiers under the act of July, 1864.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up the resolution granting the use of the Senate Chamber to Mrs. Walling for the purpose of delivering a lecture.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is to be no debate upon that resolution, and it will not supersede the special order, I am perfectly willing that a vote may be taken upon it; but if the motion involves a postponement of the pending order I object to it.

Mr. WADE. I do not propose to debate it. I suppose it is understood by the Senate, and that we can get a vote upon it at once. If it gives rise to debate, I shall let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope, then, the vote may be taken. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be granted to Mrs. M. C. Walling for the purpose of delivering therein an address, on Tuesday evening, the 17th instant; the floor of the Senate Chamber to be for the exclusive accommodation of members of the Senate and House of Representatives and their families.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the time mentioned in it and inserting "Monday evening, the 7th instant."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to offer an amendment to this resolution. I was opposed to the resolution, but since the Chamber has been granted to Mr. Murdoch and was once granted to this lady and then reconsidered, I think it would be cruel to refuse it now. I shall therefore vote for the resolution; but I think there ought to be a stop put to the practice (which is evidently going to be very prevalent unless we stop it by a resolution) of granting the use of this Chamber. In the other House they have been obliged to pass a resolution making it out of order to offer any such resolution, and now, the House Hall being closed, all persons who wish to lecture without going to the expense of paying for a hall will come here and apply for this Chamber. The objections to it are too manifest to need any recapitulation. I move to amend the resolution by inserting at the end of it the following:

And that hereafter the Senate Chamber shall not be granted for any other purpose than for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt whether we should tie our hands for the future.

Mr. ANTHONY. We can repeal it whenever we choose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment will not tie our hands in the future. It can be superseded by a resolution offered hereafter.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand very well it cannot legally and technically, but it does in form.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Doolittle, Fessenden, Howard, Howe, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Cragin, Edmunds, Grimes, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wright—15.

So the resolution was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 130) to carry into immediate effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 197) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy;

A joint resolution (S. No. 34) expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. EDWARD COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 158) to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, and to secure certain moneys to the people of the United States, or to persons to whom they are due and who are entitled to receive the same;

An act (S. No. 255) to remit and refund certain duties; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 56) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the claim of Beals & Dixon against the United States.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. HOWE. I am going to vote for this amendment if I get a chance. I think I will vote for any part of it, for almost any one line of it. I would rather vote for the whole of it than for any part of it. It was said last evening that the modification made by the mover of the amendment was more objectionable than the amendment as originally introduced. Mr. President, what is this proposition? As introduced it proposed to say that no part of the money to be appropriated by this bill should be expended on persons or officers undertaking to exercise or perform the duties of an office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate who shall not be confirmed by the Senate. The language is:

That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

What is the objection to that? The objection urged was that incompetent or dishonest and faithless men may be found in office during the recess of the Senate, and it might become necessary in the judgment of the Executive, and in the judgment of all men it might be manifestly necessary to remove that officer, and if we adopted the amendment as it then stood, it would preclude payment to the successor of an officer so removed. In other words, it was held to be a check upon the right of the President to remove an incompetent officer or a dishonest officer in the recess of the Senate. To meet that objection to the amendment it was modified yesterday, and the latter clause of it now reads:

Unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office; the cause in case of removal to be reported to the Senate at its next session.

What is the objection to that? It was said yesterday, it has been said repeatedly during this debate, that the question of the right of the President to make removals had been settled, was established, was no longer to be controverted. If that be so, I am opposed to the whole amendment. If it is settled that the President has under the Constitution the right to remove officers at his pleasure, let him do it. I hold that the President ought to discharge every part of the duty laid upon him by the Constitution. When he does make a removal then he makes a vacancy; and I know, when a vacancy exists, the Constitution makes it the bounden duty of the President to fill it or to see that it is filled. If the Senate be not in session he must fill it himself. If the Senate is in session, he must nominate and enable the Senate to fill it. If, therefore, it be the settled construction of the Constitution that the President may remove officers at his pleasure, then a vacancy legally, regularly occurs, and when that vacancy is filled it is the duty of the Legislature to appropriate the money necessary to pay the salary.

I hold, Mr. President, that this amendment is one of the most important, if not the most important, proposition that I have been called to vote upon since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor. It is nothing less than whether a hundred millions of money is to be placed in the hands of the President of the United States, and always kept there, to be used in propagating political opinions with the people of the United States. I never saw an opinion, I never heard of a political opinion that I would be willing to propagate at that expense. I think if we confine this missionary work to the proper organs, all political opinions which are proper to be inculcated upon the American people may be inculcated at a much less expense.

I will not vote for this amendment; I will not vote for any other proposition which is calculated either to restrict the powers which the Constitution confers upon the President or which are calculated to embarrass him in the exercise of those powers; and I say once more, if the Constitution does delegate to the President of the United States the right or the power to make these removals, it is our duty to acquiesce in that construction, to recognize the vacancies thus created, to cooperate cheerfully with the President in filling them, and appropriate regularly and annually the money necessary to pay the officers thus appointed; but I say that that power never was given to the President by the Constitution and never ought to be vested in him by the Constitution.

This question has been treated as if all the officers whose duty it is to collect the customs, whose duty it is to collect the internal revenue, whose duty it is to act as marshals and deputy marshals of the several districts, all these subordinate officers were the mere assistants, aids, waiters, personal attendants upon the President to help him discharge his duties, and as though he were individually and officially responsible for all their acts.

I controvert both those propositions. There is not one of these officers, from the collector of customs to the deputy marshals, but what is a minister of the law. Almost every one of these offices has been created by law, by the enactment of Congress, to perform some duty which Congress thought ought to be discharged. There is no manner of truth or propriety in saying that they are the agents or the aids of the President of the United States. They are simply the agents or ministers of the people of the United States, called to do their work, commissioned to serve their interests. And I deny that the President of the United States is responsible for their conduct or misconduct. Nobody ever urged, nobody ever thought of intimating, no one ever thought of holding the head of one of your Executive Departments responsible for the conduct or misconduct of those employes working under his immediate eye. When there have been defalcations, peculations, or other acts of misconduct, who ever thought of holding the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, or any one of the heads of the Executive Departments responsible for such misconduct or for any misconduct of subordinates? Each one of those officers has an official duty to discharge, and each one of them, whether he be the head of a Department or a clerk in it, has his duties prescribed by law, not always to be found in the statute, but the authority is found in the statute for directing him in the discharge of his duties. When he discharges them he receives the credit of fidelity. When he fails to discharge those duties he ought to receive the punishment due to infidelity. I am not sure that he always does.

Mr. President, the light to be gathered from the language of the Constitution is in a small compass and it seems to me is conclusive. The Constitution says that the President—

"Shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

What possible ideas could the makers of this Constitution have had in their heads when they used this language, if they did intend that after all the President should have the right to remove all these appointees when he pleased to do so? Why require the concurrence of the Senate in the appointment of a postmaster if the moment the Senate adjourns the President can create a vacancy in that office, which he fills himself, independent of the Senate? That interpretation of the Constitution would give us the services of postmasters and other officers for about twenty-four hours in the year. On the last day of the session of this body the President might send us the names of those officers whom he wanted confirmed. That complies with the clause of the Constitution which says he shall nominate. He has discharged that duty. Then we confirm or we reject as we see fit. Suppose we confirm under those circumstances? He would surely send us men unobjectionable to the Senate, however objectionable they might be to him, and why? Because we adjourn to-morrow, and as soon as we have adjourned he has nothing to do but quietly displace the officer and then there is a vacancy, and that vacancy the Constitution expressly tells him to fill himself by a commission emanating from himself. This provision, requiring the concurrence of the Senate to any of these appointments, you see, if that is the interpretation of the power of removal, is the idlest thing in the world.

But if this power to remove officers is at all necessary, or was thought to be necessary to be vested in the President in order to secure the efficiency of the public service, why did the makers of the Constitution say to Congress in so many words, "You may take from the President the appointment of just as many of these subordinate officers as you please?" It does say "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper"—we are the judge of what are inferior officers where they are not prescribed in the Constitution—"in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." Every one of these subordinate officers the President may by act of Congress be deprived of all control over, and the appointment may be vested in your courts or in the heads of the Departments. Why did the framers of the Constitution give this power to Congress if they deemed it essential that the President should have a continuing, supervising control over these officers? It is evident to my mind that such an idea never entered the head of any member of that Convention. Not a word is said of the President's power to remove anybody. The Senator from Maryland reminds us that not a word is said of the right of the President with the concurrence of the Senate to remove anybody. That is true; but I understood him to admit that the President with the concurrence of the Senate would have the right to remove any officer appointed by the President with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I intended to say, and what I supposed I did say, was that the nomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate of an officer would necessarily act upon and remove the previous incumbent; as both cannot be in the same office, the incumbent must go out.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator correctly, I think. The power of removal, when not restricted by supreme law, he said, and I agree, is an incident to the power of appointment. The power of appointment being unlimited, the making of one appointment to-day is not of itself a reason why another should not be made to-morrow. It has not exhausted the power; that power still continues in the same tribunal; and if he make another to-morrow it is a vacation of the one made to-day, because two officers cannot occupy the same office any more than two bodies can occupy the same space. The right of the President and the Senate to remove does follow, in the estimation of the Senator from Maryland, as in my own, as an incident to the power of appointment; but how does the President get it? Where does he get the power to remove officers whom he does not appoint, whom he cannot appoint, but who can only be appointed by the concurrent act of the President and the Senate? The Constitution is silent; it does not follow as an incident of the appointing power, because he has not the appointing power; it no more follows as an incident that the President can remove a man appointed by the President and Senate than it follows that he can remove an officer appointed by the Supreme Court here—its clerk, for instance. Where does it come from? Nay, the Constitution is not absolutely silent upon the power of removal, for the Constitution does declare that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." These terms cover every officer in the civil service of the United States. There is a method by which they may be removed—the power of impeachment.

The idea that is urged here by the Senator from Maryland, and has been urged by others, "You must not tie up the hands of the President; if you mean to have an efficient and honest discharge of the public service, you must give him the right to remove faithless officers"—this idea was not out of the minds of those men who made this Constitution; but they never thought of saying that the President might remove at will, and upon his own judgment, any man whom he deemed to be faithless or whom he deemed to be unsatisfactory. No; they said, "Here is a trial; they may be removed for these offenses, upon trial and conviction before the Senate of the United States," that being the only tribunal that can try an impeachment. I am not about to say that this right of removal through the process of impeachment, inasmuch as it is expressly given, is given to the exclusion of all other means; I do not mean to say that the law-making power cannot vest in the President of the United States or elsewhere the right to make removals for causes which are not matters of impeachment; but I do say, just here, that in my judgment, the men who made this Constitution understood an office to be something very different from what it has been treated in this debate, and very different from what it has been understood to be in the estimation of American politics for at least the last thirty years. An office was understood by them to be an estate, to be conferred upon men only because they were worthy and capable of serving the public, and to be taken from men only because they ceased to be worthy and capable; and the question whether they had so ceased or not they never dreamed was to be determined by any mere political agency actuated by mere political feeling.

Let me say a few words now upon the matter of authority, for this question is not a new one—it has been debated over and over again. It came under debate, as we learn, in 1789 for the first time. The Senator from Maryland objected to this amendment because it covered all officers, including, as he says, members of the Cabinet as well as others, and because it never was, as I understood him to say, imagined by any statesman, in the early days of the Republic, that a member of the Cabinet could hold office a day or an hour against the will of the President; that he was intended to be the confidential friend and adviser of the President, to be in his confidence; that he must have his confidence, and nobody imagined that one could hold that office who was not in every way entirely satisfactory to the President. In answer to that idea I have to remind the Senate that the very first debate which arose in the history of our Government upon this power of removal arose in 1789, on the passage of an act creating an Executive Department, to be known as the Department of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend will permit me to interrupt him for a moment. That is true; but the objection to the particular bill to which the honorable member refers was that in the preamble it assumed that the general power of removal was in the President, not that he would not have the right to change his Cabinet officers.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not reproduce the debate. There was a bill pending before the Congress of the United States to create the Department of Foreign Affairs, now the Department of State. That proposed to make the head of the Department removable at the pleasure of the President. That was supposed to raise the question of the President's power to remove officers, and it led to a lengthy debate in the Administration of General Washington, the first President of the United States. The decision was that the bill should pass, notwithstanding those terms. The argument which supported the bill did insist upon the right of the President to remove officers generally, and that the power of removal was in the President. But, sir, after all, I think any one who reads that debate, I think it has been the judgment of American statesmen generally since—I am not about to sum up their opinions, but I think it is the judgment of American statesmen who have considered the subject since the date of that debate—that the weight of the argument, that the reason of the thing, was on the side of those who denied this right of removal; and we cannot fail to know that the mere circumstance that the executive office was then in the hands of General Washington must have influenced the result of that debate very materially. I do not know that the first President laid claim to any such power; but we all know that it was not the habit of the American people at that time to wait for him to lay claim to honors or to powers. They thrust honors upon him; and if he had laid claim to the shirt of every one of the men who voted to concede him this power of removal, I do not doubt that every one of them would have stamped Washington's name on their garments in a moment. They were not in a mood to deny anything that he asked for himself, or that was asked in his behalf. That was the decision, though made at that time and upon that bill to create the Department of State. Since that the subject has been under debate. In 1820 an act was passed entitled "An act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes;" the first section of which is in these words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passing of this act all district attorneys, collectors of the customs, naval officers, and surveyors of the customs, naval agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of the land offices, paymasters in the Army, the apothecary general, the assistant apothecaries general, and the commissary general of purchases, to be appointed under the laws of the United States, shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure."

That is the first section of the act, and it is all I care to read. Why did the Congress of the United States attempt to fix the tenure of these officers? Clearly because they thought they had the power to do it. Why did they, in the same act, confer upon the President the right to remove these officers, any of them, during this term? Clearly because they thought the President ought to have the right and had it not. There can be no plainer declaration of the opinion of Congress that the Constitution does not confer this right upon the President than this attempt of theirs to give it to him; and here it is, in so many words. This act passed, it seems, without attracting any debate, without any controversy; but it was not acquiesced in for a long time without controversy. In 1835 an attempt was made to repeal the first section of the act, and the second section, which I did not read; and a bill was introduced into the Senate of the United States for that purpose. It was subjected to a debate, and a pretty thorough debate, which I do not propose to read even an extract from; but I must call the attention of the Senate to the vote upon the passage of that bill. It was a bill to repeal this section of the act of 1820, which conferred upon the President of the United States the right to remove these officers during the continuance of their term; and upon the passage of that bill the yeas were—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wagerman, Webster, and White—31, including, is it too much to say, not merely the ablest men of that time, but some who have been ranked among the ablest of any time, either in this country or elsewhere. In the negative are recorded the names of Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Morris, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, and Wright—16. The vote is almost two to one in number, denying this right of removal to the President, and in weight of character, force of intellect, ability to comprehend—I was going to say something strong, but I am admonished by a look of my friend over the way, [Mr. MORRILL,] and I will simply say quite two to one.

Mr. President, in the face of such a vote as that so recent as 1835, had, with full review of the debate in 1789, which it is asserted here settled the whole question, I do not think it is fair or safe to say that this right in the President is a matter of fixed and established construction. Being firmly convinced myself that the Constitution does not confer any such power upon the President, that it was never meant to confer any such power upon the President, that it is a power which he does not need, which he ought not to have, and which no one man can be intrusted with with safety to the public service, I have watched this debate and I shall look for the vote upon the amendment with as much interest as I have attended upon any debate which has taken place and any vote which has been given in this Chamber. I concede the right of the Legislature to vest this power in the President if they see fit, but I want the Legislature to understand that if hereafter he exercises the power it is not his fault; it is the fault of the Legislature. He will exercise it if you permit him, beyond all question. I would if I were in his place. How he will employ it, to what end he will employ it, it is not for me to say, not for us to anticipate. If you want the President to be clothed with this power, and to have the disbursement of these millions, say so; take the consequences; be manly about it; but do not let us refuse to pay an officer that we authorize him to appoint.

But we are asked, what good will it do us to pass this amendment? What is the object? What is the inducement? I will tell you one good that will come of it, I think. I find in a recent paper a dispatch like this sent out from this city:

"Within a few days past a great change is noticeable in the matter of executive appointments. The President seems to have realized that longer forbearance with the enemies of his Administration and its measures was working rank injustice to his friends, and to have realized the potency of the old party maxim, that 'to the victors belong the spoils.' As a consequence, the radicals who mustered effrontery enough to call upon the President and solicit appointments for their friends, received little reward for their labors, and were treated to a plain exposition of his intentions for the future. They were told in language decisive and unmistakable, that his friends should have the preference, and that no known enemy of the Administration policy should receive the quasi indorsement of a Federal appointment. In addition to this, the ax has actually been set to work, and decapitations are now of daily occurrence. Its effects are already visible in the altered and respectful deportment of more than one radical opponent in both branches of Congress."

Thank God, I am no radical! It does not refer to me.

"Heretofore, when the President's Private Secretary was sent to the Capitol on official business, he was received with a haughty frigidity that was absolutely insulting. Within a few days all have become anxious to do him reverence. He is met with the blandest of smiles, and surrounded by crowds who protest against any rupture of the friendly relations that should exist between the President and Congress, and who vie with each other in bestowing attentions, uttering pretty speeches, and deprecating the idea that they are or ever were in hostility to the Executive. But the work will go on. No one will be deceived by hollow pretenses. Those office-holders who have abused their positions to vilify the President and disrupt the Republican party will be made to give way to better men. The bare manifestation of this resolve has already half accomplished its purpose."

So it is written. What good will it do to adopt this amendment? It is asked. Why, sir, it will satisfy the country that this work is only half done; at least that we are not more than half subdued to what is called the President's policy; that something remains yet to be done. It will do something to convince the country that there is a little of the spirit which should imbue an American Congress left still here in these Houses, which are daily visited by the messenger from the President; that although polite, as I am glad to learn we habitually are, we are not entirely subservient and obsequious, nor slavish. It will do something to satisfy the country that the revenues which the people are yielding up with a most prodigal hand to meet the demands, and the just demands, of the nation, are appropriated in accordance with the best interests of the people, and to promote the great ends which induced them to yield them.

Mr. President, there is a feature in this dispatch that I think demands especial notice. We are informed in it that—"The President seems to have realized that longer forbearance with the enemies of his Administration and its measures was working rank injustice to his friends, and to have realized the potency of the old party maxim, that 'to the victors belong the spoils.'"

We are subsequently told that the ax is in motion. The ax is in motion for what? To hew down and appropriate the spoils to the victors? Who are those victors that are gathering in the spoils, and when and where did they achieve their victory? These questions ought to be answered. I cannot answer them. I know of no victory that the President of the United States has achieved since 1864, when the loyal hearts and the loyal hands of the United States elevated him to the second office in the gift of the American people. If he has achieved a victory since then I have omitted to read of it in the papers, and I have not been informed of it in any way. Who were those victors that achieved that victory? I had a slight hand in it myself, and all my heart was in it. I thought I was triumphant, and that the nation was, when the choice fell on Andrew Johnson instead of Mr. George H. Pendleton of Ohio. When and how was this victory, which I thought I could safely hug to myself, changed into a defeat? I have not changed it, nor consented to the change of it, nor have I appointed the time when I shall consent to the change of it. If spoils belong to the victors, I really submit that to the Union party, who have achieved all the victories that have been achieved at all, whether in the forum or on the field, since 1860, ought to have some share in these spoils.

I think, Mr. President, much good, great good every way, will come of the adoption of this amendment. You will improve the character of the public service. The great, the leading, the most delicate trusts which your different statutes have created to be executed by these officers will then be in honorable and honest and brave hands, and they will feel that they are secure in the possession of those trusts. Refuse this and you will see every one of them scrambled for, gambled for by a class of men that I will not attempt to describe, for the English language is not yet quite copious and rich enough to describe them adequately; but let the prevailing system of politics continue for twenty years and you can get out of our lexicographies a better description of them than ever was found of any natural curiosity yet in human language.

Much good every way will come of the adoption of this amendment. In addition to securing more faithful service in these offices, you will satisfy the country that you have got a Legislature which does not get down on its knees when a message is received from the White House, which does not take its gospel from the President of the United States, which does not vote the money of the people according to his dictation, but a Legislature which listens to the people that created it, takes its gospel from them, from them gets instruction, to them holds itself responsible, and to their will is now and hereafter always amenable. This will be gained, I think, by adopting this amendment.

But, says the Senator from Maryland, it will not do to urge this thing; it will not do to press it now; we must have peace; we are confronting critical times; the Secretary of State has written a letter to some one of our foreign ministers, and it looks as though we might have a fight; we are in danger of war; we must have peace at home; this division between the President and Congress must terminate. God hurry on that day; I am as heartily anxious to see it as any man; but how shall we bring it about? There is no man I know to whom peace seems more desirable than to me, but how shall we get it? How is it to be attained? Is it only found at the White House, and delivered in small packages done up to order and obtained by the Congress of the United States upon the personal application of its different members? Is that the only way we can get peace? Well, I guess we had better go without it a short time longer. Is it only to be obtained by our surrendering the most manifest terms of the Constitution and surrendering the dearest interests of the American people? Is peace only to be had upon such terms as these? I guess it would be too expensive. We declined peace in 1861 upon these terms. We might have had it then precisely upon these terms. If we would have surrendered the expressed will of the American people, abandoned their choice, subjected them to the dictates of those men who said there should be no peace until we did that, we might have had peace. You can always have peace if you will not resist what anybody will do. If all wrong and outrage and injury be accepted as readily and as cheerfully and as politely and as courteously as right and justice, you can have peace. Let a man cuff you and take it good-naturedly without contest or struggle, peace remains. Turn the other cheek as a reply to being smote upon the one, and you can have peace upon those terms.

But, sir, the trouble was that the American people had not quite made up their minds to take peace upon those terms. They thought that under this organic law they were made the arbiters in American affairs. They thought they had the right to send representatives here, each State to send two to this Chamber, and every district in each State to send one to the other Chamber; and when they had them here, they thought they had a right to be obeyed by them. They thought they had the right to send them here, a right conceded in this instrument—conceded, no; that is not the word I mean to use—secured to them in this instrument to send men here, to do what? Their own pleasure? The pleasure of the President? No, no; the pleasure of the men who sent them here, to execute the will of their constituents. That is what they thought. They have been cheated into that idea, and they are not willing to give it up; and I think for the present we had better indulge them in this idea, even if it be a fallacy. The time is coming, Mr. President, as sure as you live, when it will not be a fallacy; when it will be a reality. The time is coming when these people who have under this instrument the right to send representatives here will see to it that the representatives do their will and not the will of the President.

Notwithstanding I am as anxious as the Senator from Maryland to have peace, I do not see the way to it as he directs; but I know a way to it; I know a way to peace. Let the President of the United States recognize this body—I do not mean this Senate, but these two Houses—as the law-making power, and let us recognize in him the Executive of the United States. Then we can have peace. If he does not discharge his duty exactly as we like, we will not undertake to interfere with him if he will let us discharge our duties as we understand the people who sent us here require of us. Then I think there is room enough in the United States for both the President and the Congress to exist and to breathe.

Sir, I cannot look back to see precisely how I have expressed myself. If I have uttered a sentence or a word which looked like a complaint of the President for exercising the power of removal, I have been a little misunderstood. I do not want anything I have said to be interpreted in that way. I am not the man to complain or to whine because the President does what the law lets him do. I said once, I think, and if I have not said it, I say it now, that if I were there I would do the same thing. I would have my friends in these offices if you would let me have them there and pay them for being there.

I am told the President is afflicted with an idea. I know what that disease is. I had one myself once. I suppose he believes in it. I can understand that the more readily because I am in the habit of believing in my own ideas. I suppose he wants the American people to accept it. That is natural. If he honestly believes in it, he ought to desire them to accept it; but I want the American people to accept my idea. No, I do not exactly ask them to accept it—they have got it bad, and I want them simply to hold on to it, and I do not want them to be dragged into letting it go. But I am not finding fault with the President for doing any one thing that you let him do, that the law permits him to do, in order to induce the American people to accept his idea. He himself was once, not a President, but a legislator. He himself seems to have, on one occasion at least, and I think on many, developed a very accurate and a very creditable idea of the duties of a representative. On the 19th of December, 1860, talking in this Chamber to the American Senate, prescribing their duty to that party who had not been victorious in the election of 1860, but had been defeated, and the party to which he then belonged, he reminded them what they could do and what they ought to do. He reminded them that Mr. Lincoln had been elected according to the Constitution and according to law, and said:

"I am for abiding by the Constitution, and in abiding by it I want to maintain and retain my place here and put down Mr. Lincoln and drive back his advances upon southern institutions, if he designs to make any. Have we not got the brakes in our hands? Have we not got the power? We have. Let South Carolina send her Senators back; let all the Senators come; and on the 4th of March next we shall have a majority of six in this body against him. This successful sectional candidate, who is in a minority of a million, or nearly so, on the popular vote, cannot make his Cabinet on the 4th of March next unless this Senate will permit him."

That is a clause which I think has escaped the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland. There is one statesman who certainly thought the Senate had something to say about advising the appointment of a Cabinet minister.

"Am I to be so great a coward as to retreat from duty? I will stand here and meet the encroachments upon the institutions of my country at the threshold; and as a man, as one that loves my country and my constituents, I will stand here and resist all encroachments and advances. Here is the place to stand. Shall I desert the citadel, and let the enemy come in and take possession? No. Can Mr. Lincoln send a foreign minister or even a consul abroad unless he receives the sanction of the Senate? Can he appoint a postmaster whose salary is over a thousand dollars a year without the consent of the Senate? Shall we desert our posts, shrink from our responsibilities, and permit Mr. Lincoln to come with his cohorts, as we consider them, from the North to carry off everything? Are we so cowardly that now that we are defeated, not conquered, we shall do this? Yes, we are defeated according to the forms of law and the Constitution; but the real victory is ours; the moral force is with us."

That is the way your President talked when he was a Senator. Do you suppose that he, who then knew so well what belonged to the character of an American Senator has forgotten it now? Does he not remind us to-day of the duty that devolves upon us? Do you think he was prepared to cover with smiles and blandishments a messenger from Mr. Lincoln in those times, if he had been President, or that he will entertain any very hearty and cordial respect for us if we do the like to his messengers? I think not. I would rather take the advice found here in the language of the President himself as a guide in discharging the duties of a Senator on this floor, and in this emergency, than to follow the suggestions so persuasively urged upon us yesterday by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I had no idea of occupying so much time when I rose. I want the Senate to adopt this amendment. I think the Senate had better adopt it as it stands. I do not care to deny to the President the right to remove officers for cause, but if the Senate sees fit to deny that, I acquiesce. The effect of this last provision is simply to leave that power of removal for cause in his hands and to deny him the right to make removals for any other reason. But either the part or the whole of this amendment, I ask the Senate, out of respect for itself, out of its respect for the country, out of its regard for duty, and above all, out of regard to the true meaning of the Constitution of the United States which each of us has sworn to support and defend, to adopt.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I think this amendment is in bad taste, and particularly at this time. When a proposition of this kind was first presented I was asked if I made the charge that it was an attempt to curtail the President's power. I told him that I did not; my charge was that it was carrying out the vindictive spirit of some one in the body who wanted to prevent particular persons from being appointed to fill the place of certain persons now enjoying office and emoluments after their term should be over. But he has amended it now so as to deny a right heretofore conceded, and to make it really an assailment of the power of the President and a denial to his appointees of the reward of office to which every man is entitled who discharges the duties of office.

My objection to this measure is that the question was settled in 1789, settled when a great many of the men who had participated in making the Constitution were here in Congress, settled at the instance of Mr. Madison, who, perhaps, better understood the Constitution than any one else, and who regarded the power of removal as a power incidental to the executive duties which the Constitution conferred upon the President. This power of removal was acquiesced in during the Administration of Washington. I think the Senator from Wisconsin attributes more deference to Washington on the part of Congress than was felt or acted upon. However that may be, the power was exercised by Jefferson, by Madison, by Monroe, and by Adams, in a greater or less degree. It has been the settled doctrine of the Constitution since 1789 to the present time. My objection to this species of legislation is that it is an attempt to change the settled construction of the Constitution, which has been acted upon and sanctioned by the American people; it is a revolution in relation to the appointing and removing power, a civil revolution inaugurated by the members of Congress who go back and criticise the action of their predecessors in coming to the resolution arrived at in 1789, and it is done obviously and clearly because these gentlemen do not agree that the President shall not have the power of removing certain men who support them and their measures in opposition to him. We all know that there are very few of them who, when they come to make a speech, can deny it.

I am very sorry for the difference that has grown up between the President and Congress upon the subject of reconstruction. I was prepared to take the President's recommendations. I was disposed to consider that the result of the battle-field had given us full and fair guarantees. From the action of those States in electing Legislatures and changing their constitutions; from their sending representatives to the Senate and to the other House and asking admission into these Halls, I was disposed to take them on the credit of the acts they had done; to take them as sincere men; to take them as our generals on the field were prepared to take them, and forget and forgive the past. I believed we could do more with them for the Union and for the prosperity of this nation while they were in this body and consulting with us, and in the daily performance of acts of kindness toward each other and to our respective sections, than we could do by keeping them out and abusing them and declaring a distrust of them. I still think it would have been better if we could have come together and agreed. I charge no man with willfully doing these things to keep them out, and to keep them in a conquered position; but I know that is the deliberate opinion of the gentleman who last spoke that we should do so, for he proposed to put them under territorial governments and to provide from the Treasury of the United States for the expense of maintaining territorial governments for the people of these eleven States. I have no doubt he is sincere in his opposition to the policy of the President and in his desire to curtail the President's power; but I was glad to hear him say that if he was President of the United States he would exercise this power which all Presidents have exercised. I do not believe he loves his enemies any better than he loves his friends; and he has said that he would stand by his friends.

I am unwilling to change by vote of mine or to sanction a change of the construction of the Constitution in this particular as it has existed ever since the days of Washington and has been exercised by all the Presidents. There may be dangers, there may be inconveniences in adhering to it; but I believe this Government cannot be carried on successfully and advantageously without the power of removal being invested in the Executive. I believe the power of Congress and public sentiment will always restrain the Executive in the direction in which he ought to be restrained. I advise and counsel no unjust or improper deference to the President; but I do advise that we will let the landmarks settled by our fathers and adhered to by all succeeding Administrations stand where we found them. I do not want to put it in the power of the President to say that Congress is making war upon him by denying to him a power that all the Presidents of the United States have exercised, or curtailing it as far as possible.

I have no doubt that Congress could have passed a law authorizing the President to fill any vacancies that might occur, and then it would have been proper to let it go on as it has gone on without law upon the assumption that it came within the class of cases enumerated in the Constitution.

I shall vote against the amendment because I am unwilling to change the settled construction of the Constitution in this particular. I am not willing to set the precedent of making war upon the President and curtailing a power that has been exercised by all the Presidents of the United States in a greater or less degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Creswell, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Guthrie, Johnson, Morgan, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Willey—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—19.

Mr. WADE. I offer an amendment, to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all advertising, notices, and proposals for contracts for the Post Office Department, and all advertising, notices, and proposals for contracts for all the Executive Departments of the Government, required by law to be published in the city of Washington, shall hereafter be advertised by publication in the two daily newspapers in the city of Washington having the largest circulation, and in no others: Provided, That the charges for such publications shall not be higher than such as are paid by individuals for advertising in said papers: And provided also, That the same publications shall be made in each of said papers equally as to frequency, and that the circulation of such papers shall be determined upon the 10th day of June annually; and the publishers of all papers competing for such advertising shall furnish a sworn statement of their bona fide paid circulation of each regular issue for the preceding three months; and shall in like manner certify under oath that such circulation has not, during the said three months, been increased by any gratuitous circulation, by a reduction in price below the ordinary and usual price of such papers, or by any other means, for the purpose of obtaining the official advertising: Provided, That the charge for such advertising shall not be greater than is paid for the same publication in other cities, or at a higher rate than is paid by individuals for like advertising.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the law now?

Mr. WADE. I suppose the object of this advertising is to give the widest circulation possible to these contracts, so as to create competition for them. The law as it now stands, and which this amendment seeks to modify, is the following section in the naval appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1845:

"SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where proposals for any contract or contracts, to be made by any of the Executive Departments or bureaus, and in all cases where notices of any description, issuing from the same, are now required by law to be advertised, the same shall be advertised by publication in the two newspapers in the city of Washington having the largest permanent subscription, and at the discretion of the Executive in any third paper that may be published in said city: Provided, That the charges for such publications shall not be higher than such as are paid by individuals for advertising in said papers: And provided also, That the same publications shall be made in each of said papers equally, as to frequency."

The present law, after providing very carefully for selecting the two papers that have the largest subscription, leaves it at the option of the President to take a third paper, without any regard whatever to its circulation, which really destroys the efficacy and symmetry of the law entirely, and is inconsistent with its provisions. The object being, as I said before, as I suppose, to give the widest circulation possible to these notices, when the law provided that they should be published in the two papers having the largest circulation, it was entirely inconsistent with that provision then to say that the President, without any regard to its circulation, might, at his discretion, take any third paper. The object of the amendment is to correct that, and to have the advertising done in the papers of the very widest circulation. The old law was not properly guarded to secure that. This amendment requires that affidavits shall be made as to the amount of the circulation, so as to secure honesty in the calculation, and to see that the law is not evaded. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CONNESS. As this amendment was originally introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio it proposed to repeal an existing section of law, and would also, without his intention, repeal another section of the existing law necessary to be in existence; and the attention of the Department was particularly directed to what the effect of the amendment as originally prepared would be. The amendment, as proposed now by the Senator, has been reconstructed so as to avoid that difficulty, so as to make it acceptable and not objectionable in that regard.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague if this amendment places the advertisements in Washington on the same footing in which they are placed in other cities where they are required by law to be made.

Mr. WADE. I understand it to be so. I am told by those that know better than I do that it is the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to make any discrimination for or against the papers here.

Mr. WADE. I think it will not.

Mr. CONNESS. This places it on the highest public ground.

Mr. SHERMAN. It puts them in the same position as papers published in other cities, as I understand.

Mr. CONNESS. I think it does.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have only one remark to make on this proposition, and it is simply this: during the last Administration it was not found necessary, on grounds of public policy or otherwise, to propose any such amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill as is now proposed; it was not found necessary during the Administration preceding that; and I do not know what necessity exists now, under the present Administration, for making such a proposition greater than existed under preceding Administrations. Perhaps, however, the country will be able to understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose the following amendment to come in at the end of the first section:

To enable the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory to carry out the object of the Senate resolution of March 19, 1866, for report of Isthmus routes to the Pacific ocean, $1,500.

I will simply say, in explanation of this amendment, that the Senate passed a resolution calling upon the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory to furnish a report upon the data in possession of that office relating to the Isthmus routes for the purpose of the construction of a canal for commercial uses. It is found by the Navy Department that there is no appropriation from which the expenditures necessary in making that report can be drawn. They are required to furnish maps and lines of levels, &c., requiring a good deal of work. It has also been found by Rear Admiral Davis, who has charge of the Observatory, since he entered upon the work that a large mass of the most important matter, facts of great public importance and consequence, are in possession of the office. Since the introduction of the resolution there has been sent to me by Mr. Squier, our former minister to Central America, a very large mass of important matter connected with this subject, much of it obtained from British sources, which has been forwarded to that office.

I will also say now, in connection with this matter, that it is a subject in which many of the leading men of the country are taking a very deep interest, including Lieutenant General Grant. It is proposed further to follow this up with a survey to be made during the next winter. The encouragement that the parties engaged, including the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory, have met with since they have begun their observations point to very great success in the investigations proposed and being carried out. There is no opportunity to obtain this slight appropriation in any other way than by a separate resolution, except by an amendment to one of the appropriation bills, and it was deemed fit to propose it to this bill. It is offered with the concurrence of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it reported from that committee?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 26) to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 342) in amendment of an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and the acts in amendment of and in addition thereto; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company—to the Committee on Commerce.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 130) to carry into immediate effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 342) in amendment of an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and the acts in amendment of and in addition thereto—to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to postpone all prior orders, if there are any, and take up the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 127) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was to reduce the appropriation "for contingencies of the Army" from $250,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso at the end of the bill:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used for paying the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the transportation of the troops or the property of the United States; and the Attorney General of the United States is hereby directed to institute a suit against the said company in the circuit court of the United States, in the eleventh circuit, without delay, to recover from the said company any moneys that have been paid to the said company by any department of the Government for the transportation of the troops or property of the United States; and the said Attorney General is hereby further directed to appear for the United States in said court, and prosecute its interests in the said suit.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the same controversy that we had here a year ago, and which was then very thoroughly debated, and I think the Senate by an almost unanimous vote agreed to strike out a similar proviso in the Army appropriation bill of last year. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it now, so that if a controversy should arise between the two Houses in regard to it, it may be understood. We examined the matter thoroughly a year ago and came to the conclusion that the arrangement made from Mr. Secretary Cameron and the Illinois Central Railroad Company was a reasonable one and ought to be executed in good faith by the Government, and therefore this proviso was not a proper provision to be inserted in a law. We adhere to that conclusion, after a reexamination of the subject.

Mr. YATES. I perfectly agree with the committee, and am in favor of striking out this proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $146,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be disbursed by the Secretary of War, in the erection of fire-proof buildings at or near the Schuylkill arsenal, in the city of Philadelphia, to be used as store-houses for Government purposes at that post.

I will simply say that this amendment is in accordance with a recommendation of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War. We have $6,000,000 worth of property there now, and the buildings are insecure, and they think it absolutely necessary for the security of that property and for the public service that this appropriation should be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the fortieth line on the third page:

Provided, That the quartermaster's department shall, in supplying clothing and blankets for the military service on the Pacific coast, give a preference to articles manufactured there, when the same can be obtained without paying an increased price therefor, and when the quality shall be found to be of an equal or superior character.

I wish to say, in explanation of this amendment, and I call the attention of Senators to it, that the quartermaster's department, and the Indian department also, are now, and have been, sending out to that coast, a class of blankets and cloth of the most inferior character, mostly manufactured in England, costing the Government from twenty-five to fifty per cent. more than our domestic manufactures, made entirely of wool, can be obtained for at San Francisco. I have at my room now—I did not know that this bill would be called up to-day—specimens which have been sent to me of the blankets furnished by the department with the prices that they cost the Government, and also specimens of the blankets that are manufactured at San Francisco. Those made there are made entirely of wool, and are obtainable on the ground at less than the original cost of the foreign article; and we are paying in addition for the foreign inferior article the entire cost of transportation to that coast. In addition to that, while the domestic article is made entirely of wool, at least one half or two thirds of the foreign article is infused with cow's hair. The cloth sent out there for clothing is not of so bad a character, but yet a bad character, wearing out almost immediately, and costing the poor soldier nearly all the Government pays him to be supplied with clothing. I do not think that the amendment can meet with any objection according to the terms that are proposed in it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law is now very stringent in prescribing the mode and manner in which the quartermaster's department shall purchase property for that department. Bids are to be invited, and the contracts are let to the lowest bidder. Samples are furnished, and those samples have to be complied with. Now, to make a stipulation in favor of the domestic manufacturers of California in a bill of this kind would be unusual, in violation of the general policy of the Government, and would create trouble. The same claim might be made in every other community. The same claim might be made in Missouri and Iowa and in any other State. The Senator says that California furnishes better blankets at a cheaper price. Then the people of California must learn to bid at the regular time for furnishing supplies in California. This is the only way in which it can be done. If the Senator will take pains in advising the people of California of the time and place for making bids for blankets, I have no doubt in due time the manufacturers of California, if they are springing up so rapidly—I did not know that they had manufactured in California—

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator evidently does not know a good many things.

Mr. SHERMAN. The introduction of an amendment like this, changing and modifying the existing law, will embarrass the bill, and I think it ought not to be adopted, certainly not without grave consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I should have been pleased if this amendment had met the concurrence of the Senator from Ohio, but I am very glad that the Senator has opposed it in the manner in which he has done. I do not think his objection that this amendment applies to a locality is a tenable one, because there is no other locality, he will remember, situated just like ours. We are on the other side of the continent. I am glad, however, that he has made the observations that have fallen from him. The department appear to have been as oblivious heretofore to the fact that there were manufacturers of this character in California as my honorable friend from Ohio. He says that if I shall be active in advising our manufacturers when they may bid they can get contracts to supply these articles. I beg to assure my honorable friend that there is a knack about bidding that the California manufacturers do not yet appear to understand or come up to. They have been here again and again by their agents and have undertaken to impress upon the Government and the agents of the Government employed in making these contracts the value and benefit to the Government of receiving their bids.

It has often been stated in this body that the most expensive branch of this Government, and the branch in which there is the least responsibility, is the quartermaster's department. It would hardly be necessary to affirm that that is the fact here to-day. I say this without any inclination to pass a word of censure upon the head of that department. He cannot know, managed as the department is, all that transpires. If I were at liberty to state here what I now know in regard to the impossibility of honest men getting good goods accepted, it would surprise the country and the Senate. Let me tell the Senator, and it is a startling fact, that (against a special order from the department here) after an inspection of the blankets sent out to San Francisco from the New York market, showing them to be utterly unfit for use, and after an examination and their condemnation by a military board of inspection regularly constituted, there was a peremptory order to go forward and use them; and five thousand pairs of blankets were concerned in that transaction. General Halleck examined them himself, and ordered them to be set aside, and would not permit them to be used, notwithstanding the peremptory order of the department.

Sir, this is not a new thing. It may be new in the Senate. I have at my rooms now specimens of the article that your soldiers are compelled to sleep under by this mismanagement that would surprise Senators, and they would be ashamed that either a white man or a black man should have them for his covering. The Senator smiles; but I assure him that if he were camping out and had to be warmed on a cold night by the miserable trash sent out to the soldiers on the Pacific coast he would not smile in the morning. I know the Senator's kindly heart.

There is nothing in the objection that he makes. No provision of this kind can come up in favor of Missouri or any other place. The Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] I apprehend, can bear a little testimony in this case. I will have these specimens brought here that the Senators may see them. I have had specimens already at the Quartermaster General's Office, but it is very hard to reach these things through departmental sources. The Indian department have done the same thing. They have managed in the same way. They have sent out blankets that have cost one hundred per cent. more than the blankets that are made in Oregon or San Francisco. Those blankets are made entirely of pure wool, while the blankets sent there have one half or two thirds of cow's hair, upon which your shoddy contractors have grown rich, and they and their families are shaming sensible, modest, and discreet people of both sexes at your leading hotels throughout the country. I desire merely—it is a very simple amendment—that the Government shall give the preference when they can supply a better article there at a less cost. I do not think anybody can object to that.

Mr. NESMITH. I concur fully in what the Senator from California has stated with reference to the production of these articles on the Pacific coast. I do not know, however, whether it would be good policy to incorporate a provision of this kind in this bill or not. Since I have been here, for the last five years, I have made very strenuous efforts to get the Indian department to make its purchases in that country. They manufacture in Oregon the best blankets that I know of in the world; and I presume they manufacture them equally as good in California. It is a well-known fact that the wool, which is a staple article of production in that country and in all the States and Territories of the Pacific coast, is remarkable for its cheapness. The climate and the grazing facilities are such that it costs little or nothing to raise it; and a great deal of it is shipped to this side. While labor is somewhat higher there than it is here, the low price of wool enables the manufacturer there to make these articles of a better quality than can be shipped from this side at the same price. I have had a good deal of experience in this matter, in the examination of accounts of purchases of the Indian department; and last summer while I was out on the Pacific coast in connection with a committee of investigation of Indian affairs, I took great pains to obtain all the invoices of the goods that the department furnished from New York, and then the invoices of similar goods purchased and made on the coast, and by comparing them I found that the articles were purchased much cheaper there; and by comparison of the articles themselves I found that those that were purchased on that coast were of a quality very superior to those which had been sent there.

I am as anxious as the Senator from California that the Pacific coast shall be patronized in the purchase of these articles where the quality is superior and they can be purchased quite as low as they can be on this side; but I am not certain as to the propriety of incorporating a provision of this kind in this bill. However, I am willing to vote for it. I think some means should be taken, either by the department, or if the department refuse, by Congress to compel the department to purchase where they can get the best articles and at the least price. The expense of shipment is very great.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not intend to do so, but I will now send to the desk to be read a note received this morning from the honorable Secretary of War, and I will state how and why it was written. I knew that these departments were unaware of the extent of our manufactures in this line, and also their excellence; and when I was out there last fall I ordered a pair of blankets, not of an extraordinary character but of the best quality that are made for domestic blankets, to be made to present to the Secretary of War. They came to hand the other day, and this is a note in answer describing their quality. I will ask that it be read, and ask Senators to listen to its reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1866.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge receiving the pair of excellent blankets made for me, at your request, at the Mission mills in California. They surpass anything of the kind I have ever seen, and are more perfect and beautiful than I had known to be possible in such fabrics, and prove that manufactures will, like everything else, attain to the highest perfection on the Pacific coast. Mrs. Stanton's admiration of them knows no bounds, and she joins me in the desire that you will communicate to the manufacturers, and accept for yourself, our grateful thanks.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

Hon. JOHN CONNESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think any Senator who reflects on the present law would be willing to vote for the amendment as it now stands. If there are good blankets made in California, and cheaper than can be purchased in New York, it is the duty of the Government to advertise for bids in San Francisco and Portland, and purchase them there, undoubtedly. I shall have no objection to a carefully prepared section to require bids to be published in those cities and inviting proposals; but after all, these blankets must be submitted to the inspection of officers. They must be examined to ascertain whether they correspond with the samples furnished on which bids are generally awarded. I suggest, therefore, that the Senator had better withdraw the amendment for the present. I do not intend to press the bill to a passage to-night. I merely desire to have it reported to the Senate, and then let it go over.

Mr. CONNESS. All right; I will do that. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are other amendments that may be offered, but which we are not prepared now to offer, and I therefore move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO.

Mr. BLAINE asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House at the earliest practicable day any authentic information that may come into his possession in regard to the reported barbarous bombardment of the city of Valparaiso by the Spanish fleet on the 31st of March ultimo. Also, to inform the House what instructions had been given by the Navy Department to the officer commanding the American fleet in those waters.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

JOHN R. BECKLEY.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition, claim, and papers in support of the same, of John R. Beckley, as mail contractor, heretofore presented to the Postmaster General, be referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to inquire into the justice of the same, and report by bill or otherwise.

LAND GRANTS TO NEVADA.

Mr. McRUER. I ask unanimous consent to report, from the Committee on Public Lands, Senate bill No. 216, concerning certain lands granted to the State of Nevada.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to calling this up to have it printed.

The bill was accordingly ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF 1812.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and is hereby, instructed to report by bill or otherwise on pensions to all of the surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the regular order of business.

The House accordingly proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the calling of the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Patents.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Major Moore.

PATENT OFFICE FEES.

Mr. JENCKES. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to report House bill No. 342, regulating appeals to the examiner-in-chief of the Patent Office, with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was read. It provides that upon an appeal from the examiner to the examiner-in-chief the appellant shall pay a fee of ten dollars, and no appeal shall be allowed until the said fee shall be paid.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, when this board of appeals was created no additional fee was prescribed for an appeal to it, and it has become overloaded with appeals from examiners-in-chief. Two fees are now paid in the Patent Office; one a fee of fifteen dollars upon filing the application, which is a payment for an examination; and the other is a fee of twenty dollars upon the issuing of the patent, which is the evidence that the party applying has convinced the Patent Office that he is an inventor. For the intermediate service no fee is required and none has been paid. It is reasonable that there should be a fee in view of the increased labor devolved on the Patent Office. If no one desires to debate the bill, I demand the previous question upon it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES moved to amend the title of the bill so as to read, "An act in amendment of an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and the acts in amendment of and in addition thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

PAY OF PATENT-OFFICE EXAMINERS.

Mr. JENCKES also, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," and the acts in amendment thereof; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed in the United States Patent Office, from April 1, 1861, until August 1, 1865, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for those respective grades; provided that the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It cannot be possible that I understand that bill aright. If I do, it goes back, raising the salaries of certain parties in the Patent Office since 1861.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman does not understand the bill, and if he will listen to me for a moment I think I can explain it satisfactorily. During the time named in this bill, which is the period covered by Mr. Holloway's commissionership, certain assistant examiners were employed to do the duties of examiners-in-chief. The Commissioner declined appointing additional examiners-in-chief, as he might have done under the law, because the business of the Patent Office had at that time fallen off, and he did not wish to burden the Patent Office fund by the employment of men who at some time would have nothing to do. Hence he employed assistant examiners and second assistant examiners to do the work of examiners-in-chief and first assistant examiners, and they performed it satisfactorily. Upon examining the law, he was not satisfied that he had power to pay them for the work they had performed, because he had not appointed them to the office the duties of which they had performed.

The passage of this bill is requested both by Mr. Holloway and by the present Commissioner of Patents as an act of justice to those who have done this work, so that they shall receive the pay for the work which they have done, and not be held to be satisfied by the pay of an inferior grade of officers.

The bill does not make any appropriation. These men are to be paid out of the Patent Office fund.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the gentleman how this claim came to run along from year to year for four years.

Mr. JENCKES. It has not. It was before Congress at its last session, and the bill passed the Senate, but failed in the House. I have letters here from the former Commissioner of Patents and from the present Commissioner, and a statement from the examiners themselves of the duties which they have performed, and I will have them read if gentlemen desire to hear them. The point is this: that the Patent Office fund which has been accumulated by the labors of these men should pay them just what they have earned.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Have not these men been paid their salaries regularly?

Mr. JENCKES. They have been paid salaries regularly for an inferior grade of officers, while they performed the duties of a higher grade of officers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That may be; but they have been paid the salaries of the officers the duties of which they performed.

Mr. JENCKES. No, sir; there is where the gentleman is mistaken. They have not been paid the salaries of the officers the duties of which they have performed, but salaries of officers of an inferior grade, the duties of which, of course, they did not perform during the time they were performing the other duties.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. They have been paid the salaries of the offices to which they were appointed.

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir; but they did not perform the duties of those offices, but of a higher grade of offices to which they were assigned by the Commissioner. And this is merely to pay them for what they have earned.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. That is, while they held colonels' commissions they performed the duties of brigadier generals, and now want brigadier generals' pay.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Exactly; that is just it; they want brigadier generals' pay while doing the duties of colonels.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. No, sir; while performing the duties of a brigadier general, holding the commission of a colonel.

Mr. JENCKES. That is it.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I wish merely to remark that if this great principle is adopted it will benefit a great many meritorious men. There have been thousands of men in the Army who have been commissioned as colonels, but have performed the duties of brigadier generals; and this principle would bring them all in for brigadier general's pay. It opens wide the door, and the Treasury can be most completely emptied; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. JENCKES. This bill is to pay men for the duties they have performed. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] is mistaken in comparing this case with the case of colonels performing the duties of brigadier generals. This requires no appropriation, for the money is taken from the Patent Office fund. The other would require an appropriation.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JONATHAN BALL.

Mr. JENCKES, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan Ball; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PATENTS AT PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. CHANLER, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appoint three commissioners to attend the Paris Exposition; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to appoint three commissioners to examine and report upon the patented machines and inventions which may be exhibited at the Paris Exposition of 1867; and provides that the said commissioners be empowered to employ the necessary draughtsmen and photographers to carry out the intention of this joint resolution, the necessary funds for the expenses of said commission to be drawn by the Secretary of the Interior from the Patent Office fund not otherwise disposed of, not to exceed the amount of $15,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should like to hear some explanation of this joint resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. The purpose of this proposed commission is to enable the Secretary of the Interior, if in his opinion it may be necessary, to appoint a commission of experts, who shall go to Paris on behalf of the Patent Office of this Government to examine and take the proper drawings or photographs of the patented machines which may be exhibited at the coming Exposition of 1867. The practical result of this commission will be to enlarge the records of the Patent Office, so as to enable the Commissioner of Patents to decide upon the merits of the claims presented to him for patents in this country.

Under the existing law, unless the Patent Office of this country has full and sufficient information in regard to foreign patents, any person bringing here copies and models of foreign patents may obtain patents here, although such patents may exist at that very moment abroad. All will understand that at the Exposition at Paris there will be exhibited a large number of patented machines; and persons may take copies of them and obtain patents for themselves in this country if the Patent Office here is deficient in proper information upon the subject of patents in foreign countries.

Another point is that the character of this commission, which will be appointed from among the experts and mechanical men of this country, will be such as to warrant us in believing that the information they will obtain will be of the greatest practical value to mechanical men in this country, as well as of interest to scientific men all over the world. And it will enable the Commissioner of Patents to lay before the country a full, accurate, and valuable report, one which will be of the greatest value to the mechanical interests of this country. That is the whole scope and purpose of this joint resolution.

In regard to the money which is called for by this joint resolution, the amount can be changed if the House shall think it necessary. The Committee on Patents are not committed to any sum; they have merely named this sum, because there must be some amount provided for expenses.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] if the Patent Office is not supplied from all the countries of Europe with specifications and drawings immediately upon the issuing of patents there. And I would further inquire if it is not a common thing for practitioners to send abroad for specifications and drawings of patents which they can obtain at say less than three shillings each. And what is to be obtained through this proposed commission, except the information which is now being received in the ordinary course?

Mr. CHANLER. It is a question of time. The specifications and drawings of patented machines which will be exhibited at the Exposition at Paris will not reach this country, without some such means as this, in time to enable the Patent Office of this country to be benefited by them. And the specifications which come here from Europe do not come until three years after an application is made there for patents, as I am informed at the Patent Office. And therefore, if I am correctly informed, it will be two or three years before the Patent Office will receive the necessary information in regard to inventions not yet patented.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I do not know from what source he obtains his information. But my experience is that patents are issued in England in a much shorter time after applications are made than they are in this country. And drawings and specifications are to be had for the merest pittance.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order; that this being an appropriation bill, it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken. I am sorry to say this is not an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order, even if well taken, is taken too late. But this is not an appropriation bill; it does not propose to appropriate money from the Treasury, but to take it from the Patent Office fund.

Mr. CHANLER. This joint resolution is simply to aid the Commissioner of Patents to add to the information of his bureau. That is the object of this proposition, and it comes from the Bureau of Patents.

In regard to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that patents are issued more promptly in England than in this country, he may be correct. But I hope the House will bear in mind that this Exposition of 1867 will include the new inventions and patented machines not only of England, but of France and the whole of Europe and the world. And it is not impossible that the inventions exhibited there will be copied and presented in this country in a less period of time than that required to lay before the Patent Bureau in the ordinary way full information in regard to them. It is simply in behalf of the Patent Office that this joint resolution is submitted to the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CHANLER] desires to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to appoint three high-toned gentlemen to go to Paris to look at and report upon the patented inventions which may be exhibited at the Paris Exposition of 1867, and then he goes on to propose that these three high-toned and elegant gentlemen shall be authorized to draw $15,000 of money out of the public Treasury to pay their expenses. That is the purport of the joint resolution which we are asked to pass.

Now, I need not say to the House that I am opposed to this whole thing. I am opposed to it, in the first place, because it is not necessary. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has shown to the House that there is no difficulty in obtaining all the necessary information now. All the information we will get by paying $15,000, we can get for three shillings and sixpence in every case. These commissioners are empowered to supply the necessary draughtsmen, photographers, &c., and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to draw the necessary funds for the expenses of said commissioners from the patent fund, not to exceed $15,000.

I have heard no reason which would justify the House in making this appropriation, except that we should take the money of our constituents to pay the expenses of certain gentlemen to go to Paris.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has put precisely the contrary construction on this resolution from what was intended by the committee, and from what it means. It is a measure of protection to inventors and to the people of the country. If he had considered a moment what the state of our law regarding the granting of patents is, I do not think he would have made the remarks he has. Any one who visits the Exposition of 1867, and sees exhibited machines for the first time, may prepare drawings and make some modification to apply for a patent to this country. The Exposition will not preclude him from obtaining a patent. Its publication in some foreign work will preclude him, and nothing else. Hence the office has twice before met with trouble on similar occasions, and asks to have a measure of prevention in this third case.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will understand how this may be. The information he has spoken of as obtained through publications may be long after the machinery has been done. We get the papers from the London office for a small sum. They supply intelligence from there as fast as the steamers can bring it here; but in France and Belgium information is not supplied as rapidly. It requires time to get copies of these patents. To get the volumes at our Patent Office sometimes requires three years.

Now, this Exposition takes place in Paris. Probably machines will be exhibited the first time and patents will be applied for near or about the time. Hundreds of people will visit the Exposition for the purpose of seeing what is new. Persons who have invented articles of a similar kind will get from this exhibition ideas of improvement on their own machines, or will take their ideas bodily from the foreign machines and take out patents in this country which cannot be invalidated by the exhibition of the articles there. It is not only for the purpose of protecting the office against swindling inventors, but to protect the people of this country against swindling patents, and against the claims which may grow out of them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask whether the Exposition is not in its very nature calculated to guard the Patent Office here from frauds such as the gentleman from Rhode Island suggests. The articles exhibited are likely to be published in the journals of France and Great Britain simultaneously with the Exhibition.

Mr. JENCKES. The moment any article is described in any journal in any country where the article is produced a patent obtained in this country from that fact is invalidated, as the gentleman knows. Therefore the security we have from the Exhibition is great. If the descriptions were to be published simultaneously there would be no need of this, I agree. It is from the fact that they are not published simultaneously that this is needed. The official records of the Exhibitions in England and France were not published until two years after they had taken place.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I agree that the official report of the proceedings of the Exhibition and description of the articles exhibited would not be published for a considerable length of time; but the gentleman from Rhode Island knows very well that the publication in newspapers invalidates the patent in this country.

Mr. JENCKES. There is no provision that such provision shall be made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They are certain to be made.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman must see this must be done at the opening of the Exposition, when these applications will be made here unless we take this measure to prevent them.

Mr. CHANLER demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the joint resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PHILOS B. TYLER.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Philos B. Tyler; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to decide upon the application of the petitioner for an extension of his patent for the further term of seven years, the same as if it had not been already extended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I can state in a few words all the facts that are material in this case. The improvement in cotton presses for the shipping of cotton, invented by this man, is one of great public utility, as was shown by all the testimony before the committee; and such is the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents. These presses are only available to any important extent in the cotton-growing States.

The invention was patented on the 16th of January, 1845. Just before the time of its expiration, namely, in January, 1859, the petitioner applied to the then Commissioner of Patents, Hon. Joseph Holt, for a renewal. He obtained a renewal for seven years. It appears that during the first fourteen years he perfected the improvement, and constructed and sold divers presses at the South, from which he realized a profit of $23,417 22, which sum the Commissioner deemed to be a very inadequate compensation in view of the great public utility of the invention. The Commissioner, in his report, says that it has saved to the country millions of dollars. The committee regard it as an invention of the greatest importance, and although the inventor during the whole fourteen years has realized, as appeared by the account submitted of expenditures and receipts, some twenty-three thousand dollars, the committee believe that that was an entirely inadequate compensation for the great service which he had rendered to the country.

Upon the renewal of the patent by the Commissioner of Patents in January, 1859, the petitioner went to the South and obtained divers orders for presses; returned, gathered up material at great expense for the construction of machines, employed men and went to work diligently in their construction, the orders having been obtained a year in advance and the machines to be sold on credit. But before he could perfect his machines and get them into market to any considerable extent the southern rebellion came on, which prostrated all his efforts and ruined his business at once, by means of which he lost a vast amount in material and in wages which he had to pay to his employés. He also lost a great deal in the way of debts that were due to him from the cotton-growing States. His losses, in fact, were so great that the $23,000 that had been realized by him was not only absorbed, but he was ruined in his estate and became a bankrupt, as I was informed. His whole estate, in point of fact, was swept away. It costs a very considerable sum to make one of these machines.

Now, he came to Congress with a petition asking that the seven years, which were rendered unavailable to him in consequence of the rebellion, and which resulted in his utter ruin, shall be given to him over again, as if no renewal had been granted. The committee think that it is an equitable claim. In fact, we never heard a more equitable claim. Surely none has ever been presented to the committee which seemed to make so strong an appeal to our sense of right and justice. But the committee do not ask that a bill be passed directing the Commissioner of Patents to grant this renewal. We have adopted a rule on this subject by which we are bound and restricted, and we only report a bill which authorizes Mr. Tyler, the petitioner, to submit his case to the Commissioner just as if his patent had not been renewed for seven years, during the time of the rebellion; to submit all the facts and circumstances of it; to bring his witnesses, and if he can convince the Commissioner of Patents that in equity and in law he is entitled to a renewal, then he is to have it.

This is all that pertains to the case so far as I know. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard upon it, I will move the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. The reason, as I understand it, why it is urged that the patent shall be renewed is on account of the war. I have yet to learn that we are to guaranty to all individuals payment for damages sustained on account of the war.

This patent has now been running fourteen years. I understand the gentleman to say that the patentee has made $23,000, but the committee think that is not enough, and that, therefore, we must extend the patent in order to enable him to make some more money, for the reason that the war prevented him from making as much as he otherwise would have made.

We are now, by a bill pending before the House, proposing to tax cotton five or six cents per pound, and in addition to that, it is now proposed to levy this additional tax for the machinery to be used in pressing it. It seems to me that the same reason would justify the extension of every patent which was renewed before the war broke out. For one, I am opposed to this measure.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I may say that generally anything that is reported by my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] is commended to my consideration, for I know how careful he is and how right he is generally on all matters which come before the House for consideration; but I must confess that I am somewhat astonished to see him "switch off" on this patent cotton-gin affair.

Now, I have read the report, and if the House have listened to it I think they will agree with me that there is no occasion for us to depart from the principle the House has adhered to in the last two Congresses without a single exception, when they have resolutely refused, even under the greatest pressure, to extend patents.

Now, sir, in the first instance, this man got a patent for this machine for seven years, then he got his patent renewed for seven years more. He has had his patent for fourteen years, and his petition shows that he has received between twenty-three and twenty-four thousand dollars. And now, after showing that fact, he comes here and asks us to do what? Notwithstanding that he has had this patent for fourteen years, he asks us to remit the question back to the Patent Office as an original case, and permit them to grant him another patent.

I think the reasons which he alleges are utterly insufficient to justify us in granting what he wishes; and, as was well said by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. URSON], the point on which it is put would apply to all of these cases. This man claims that during the war he could not use his patent as he would have done if there had been no rebellion; and hence he comes here and asks us to reimburse him for that loss. On the same principle every man who had a patent renewed before the war can come here and ask a renewal of his patent.

Now, Congress has for the last two or three years, as I have stated guarded, perhaps more vigilantly than anything else, this matter of allowing parties who have patents to have them renewed. This is not a case in which the party shows that he has any claim upon us to depart from the principle upon which we have heretofore acted. I hope, therefore, that the House will not pass this bill.

Mr. DAWES. It is true, as the papers in the case set forth, that this man has received in fourteen years the gross sum of $23,000 from this patent. I think it hardly follows from that statement that there has been any undue profit made out of the public from the patent.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Net profits.

Mr. DAWES. Whether it be net profits or gross receipts, to determine whether it is an inordinate sum or not, would depend upon the character and value of the invention, and the field in which the invention is to be applied. Now, this invention has direct application to the profitable cultivation of cotton; it is of no further use. It is a matter of history that the invention of the cotton-gin, which has made the whole southern country of any value whatever as a cotton-raising country, was of no profit at all to the original inventor, and he died a bankrupt, although he enriched the whole world with his invention.

Now, here is an invention in aid of the same object. And the net profits which the inventor has received during the fourteen years of the invention was only $23,000. The invention had application solely to the cultivation of cotton in the rebellious States; and during the last four years, those which were to be under ordinary circumstances the most valuable years of his invention, all profits have been lost to him from no fault of his. He does not ask for a new patent, but merely that the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to examine into the whole case, to hear the whole evidence, and to decide, under the rules and precedents which have governed the Patent Office in the renewal of patents in time past, whether there is any fair and equitable reason for the longer existence of this patent. That is the whole extent of this bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will ask him if he can deny that under this bill the Commissioner of Patents must necessarily issue this patent.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand the bill to have been drawn for any such purpose. I would not sanction a bill that would require the Commissioner of Patents to issue the patent in question. If this bill is drawn in that way, I will not support it; but I do not understand it to have been drawn for any such end.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is certain that the party understands that he will get a renewal of his patent if this bill is passed.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] to assent to what I say, that it was not the intention to draw the bill in the form indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] and if he has inadvertently so drawn it, I am quite sure he will see that it is modified. I think the party has great confidence that if the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to renew this patent he will obtain a renewal. But that confidence rests upon his belief in his ability to show to the Commissioner of Patents, what he is able to show to this House if this House were in a situation to hear patiently and fully what the Commissioner of Patents would hear, the justice of his case. If I understand the bill aright, the only authority given to the Commissioner of Patents is to hear and determine this case. I would ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] if that is the true construction of the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The bill will speak for itself. It says:

And the said Commissioner shall examine the said application and decide upon the same upon the same evidence and in the same manner as in other cases where extensions of patents are applied for under existing laws.

Now, by this clause of the bill, as this patent has been once issued, the Commissioner of Patents can do nothing else but issue the patent.

Mr. DAWES. I think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] is mistaken in that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I cannot be; that is the object of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. The Commissioner is authorized to hear and decide this case precisely as if the fourteen years for which the patent was originally granted had not yet expired; and he is to extend the patent now just the same as he would have done, and only in that way, if the application had been made before the expiration of the patent. That is, if the patentee makes out his case and shows that he has failed to receive sufficient remuneration in consequence of circumstances over which he had no control, and for which he was in no way responsible, and that there has been no neglect on his part, then he will be entitled to the reissue of his patent.

It is because this relates to a matter that at this time is peculiarly interesting, a matter intimately connected with what we are all desirous of promoting, that is, the enlarged culture of cotton and the profitable culture of cotton, that I think every invention which will contribute to that end should be encouraged; and every genius that has any ability to produce any new method and bring it properly into market should be encouraged and remunerated.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman understand that this man has already enjoyed a patent for fourteen years, and that the public is now entitled to the use of the invention without paying any further bounty?

Mr. DAWES. I certainly do not so understand.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is the fact. Yet one might suppose from the gentleman's remarks that this is an invention which we are bound to encourage, and that the public could not get the advantage of it without the passage of this bill.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman certainly does not mean to say that we are bound to steal a man's invention.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir; but when a man has enjoyed the advantage of a patent for fourteen years, and has made out of it $23,400, I do not believe that we are called upon to legislate more money into his pocket.

Mr. DAWES. I think that depends upon circumstances, the examination of which I am for one willing to remit to the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am not.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is one fact about this case which is perhaps not understood. To make one of these machines is a greater undertaking than to build an ordinary steam mill. Now, when a man makes an invention the manufacture of which costs only a trifling sum, he can very easily get his remuneration in fourteen years. But when an invention requires a vast outlay to manufacture it and to bring it into use, no man can expect, except under very extraordinary circumstances, to realize anything like a fair remuneration in fourteen years. The history of inventions shows that the inventors of those larger and costlier machines or combinations of machinery have died poor, in consequence of their struggles to perfect their inventions against untoward circumstances.

Now, it was shown before the committee that this inventor had struggled against adverse circumstances during the fourteen years of his patent, and that he had just got his business in a somewhat promising way when he obtained his extension; that the $23,000 which he received from the invention bears a very small proportion to his outlay, trouble, and suspense in his efforts to bring the invention into use. Just as he had secured the extension the rebellion broke out, depriving him in a great measure of the advantages of the extension. I think this bill should be passed. It provides for no appropriation.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I have only a few minutes left, and I must resume the floor.

I have only time to say that the bill simply proposes to submit the question of a renewal to the Commissioner of Patents, who is required to examine the whole case by witnesses, just as if the matter had not been heard in this House at all.

Mr. DRIGGS. Let me ask the gentleman whether $23,000 is all that this man received from his invention during fourteen years.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. He received that amount within the fourteen years; but it was all absorbed afterward, as well as his whole estate, by losses in the cotton States. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

On the motion there were—yeas 43, noes 49.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 57, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Dawson, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Farquhar, Finck, Grossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Henderson, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Julian, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Moulton, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Paine, Samuel J. Randall, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Scofield, Shunklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Taylor, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Bundy, Coffroth, Conkling, Darling, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, Jaffin, Lynch, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Smith, Spalding, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Van Aernam, Warner, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos B. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hoar, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, Ingessoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Keitcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Morrill, Morris, Nicholson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Wentworth, Whaley, and Woodbridge—58.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the joint committee on reconstruction, submitted testimony which had been taken before that committee in reference to Texas, Louisiana, and Florida; which was ordered to be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the same number of extra copies be printed as had been ordered of previous testimony in reference to other States.

The motion, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 498, to amend section two of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU APPROPRIATION.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the House yesterday on account of sickness, and I wish to say if I had been present I would have voted against House bill No. 545, making appropriations for the uses of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1866, appropriating as it does $11,000,000.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States," the pending section being the following:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That the pay department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one paymaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; and forty paymasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and the original vacancies in the grade of major shall be filled by selections from those persons who have served faithfully as paymasters or additional paymasters in the Army of the United States in the late war; and hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the pay department; but this provision shall not extend to graduates of West Point now in the pay department.

The pending amendment was moved by Mr. SCHENCK, to strike out in line seven the word "forty," and insert "fifty" in lieu thereof; on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to detain the House except to recall what took place when the amendment was up before, and which may have since been forgotten. In the seventh line of the twenty-third section provision is made for forty paymasters with the rank of major. The number insisted on by the Paymaster General, in an able communication read to the House, is sixty. In most of these bureaus and departments, the gentlemen who are at the head of them wish to have the greatest number of assistants, but can get along with a less number if it be found essential the number should be limited. The committee, on reconsidering the whole matter, agreed to make a compromise between the views of the Paymaster General and their own, and accordingly I moved the pending amendment to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty."

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 65, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Baldwin, Baxter, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Cobb, Darling, Dawes, Deming, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

DEEPENING SOUTHWEST PASS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of a board of engineers relative to the deepening of the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi, in reply to a resolution of the House of April 20, 1866; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TELEGRAPH TO THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. ELIOT. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill in relation to a telegraph between the United States and the West Indies:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 26) entitled "An act to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, and that it agree to the second amendment of the House with an amendment, as follows: at the end of the amendment insert the words "subject, however, to the power of Congress to alter and determine said rates;" and the House agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER,
L. M. MORRILL,
JOHN CONNESS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,
CHARLES O'NEILL,
NELSON TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, can I have the whole of that bill reported?

The SPEAKER. Not as a matter of right. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask it as a privilege.

Mr. ELIOT. I will explain what the effect of the agreement is.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think this bill went through the House without fair consideration. It appropriates a large sum of money.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House except the question of agreeing to the report of the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to explain it.

Mr. ELIOT. There were two amendments which were made to the bill in the House. The first amendment gave to the United States the free use of the line during time of peace as well as during time of war. The Senate agreed to that amendment.

The second amendment which was made by the House was that the company should not charge more than at the rate of $3 50 for each ten words. The Senate disagreed to that amendment. The managers on the part of the two Houses have agreed to the amendment, with this provision: "subject, however, to the power of Congress to fix and determine the rate at any time."

That is all that the committee of conference had before them. The effect of that amendment is to limit the rate of charges.

I ought to say that there is also in the bill a provision giving to Congress the right to alter and amend the bill at any time, so that the amendment which was agreed to in conference is really repeating what was in the bill before; but it made some parties more satisfied with the bill, and so the committee of conference agreed to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think there is undue power granted there, and for the purpose of testing the question I move to lay the report on the table.

The SPEAKER. That carries the bill with it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I make the motion.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was disagreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee was agreed to; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY BILL—AGAIN.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the corps of Engineers shall consist of one chief of engineers, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, six colonels, sixteen lieutenant colonels, twenty-two majors, thirty captains, and twenty first and ten second lieutenants, who shall have the pay and emoluments now provided by law for officers of the Engineer corps of these several grades respectively. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the several grades of lieutenant colonel, major, and captain, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of lieutenant colonels shall be reduced to fifteen, the number of majors to twenty, and the number of captains to twenty, and thereafter the number of officers in each of said several grades shall continue to conform to such reduced numbers.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a mistake in a title in that section which I desire to correct. I move to strike out the words "chief of engineers" and to insert "chief engineer" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The twenty-fifth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the five companies of engineer soldiers, and the sergeant major and quartermaster sergeant heretofore prescribed by law, shall constitute a battalion of engineers, to be officered by officers of suitable rank detailed from the corps of Engineers, and the officers of engineers acting respectively as adjutant and quartermaster of this battalion shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of adjutants and quartermasters of cavalry.

No amendments were offered.

The twenty-sixth section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the ordnance department of the Army shall consist of the same number of officers and enlisted men as is now authorized by law, and the officers shall be of the following grades, namely: one brigadier general, three colonels, six lieutenant colonels, twelve majors, twenty captains, twelve first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, all of whom shall have the same pay and emoluments as now provided by law, and thirteen ordnance storekeepers, of whom a number not exceeding six may also be appointed and authorized to act as paymasters at armories and arsenals. Ordnance storekeepers shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of infantry, and ordnance storekeepers and paymasters the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur, reducing the number of officers in the several grades of this department below the rank of brigadier general, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of colonels shall be reduced to one, the number of lieutenant colonels to three, the number of majors to six, and the number of captains to twelve; and thereafter the number of officers in each of said several grades shall continue to conform to such reduced numbers.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following amendment to that section:

On line eleven, page 15, after the word "arsenals," insert the following: "The ordnance storekeeper and paymaster at the national armory shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of other paymasters of the Army and other; so that it will read:

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the ordnance department of the Army shall consist of the same number of officers and enlisted men as is now authorized by law, and the officers shall be of the following grades, namely: one brigadier general, three colonels, six lieutenant colonels, twelve majors, twenty captains, twelve first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, all of whom shall have the same pay and emoluments as now provided by law; and thirteen ordnance storekeepers, of whom a number not exceeding six may also be appointed and authorized to act as paymasters at armories and arsenals. The ordnance storekeeper and paymaster at the national armory shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of other paymasters of the Army, and other ordnance storekeepers shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of infantry, and ordnance storekeepers and paymasters the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur, reducing the number of officers in the several grades of this department below the rank of brigadier general, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of colonels shall be reduced to one, the number of lieutenant colonels to three, the number of majors to six, and the number of captains to twelve; and thereafter the number of officers in each of said several grades shall continue to conform to such reduced numbers.

I desire the attention of the House for a moment while I state the object of this amendment, which I think will meet the concurrence of the chairman of the committee when I explain what it is.

The purpose of it is this: in the bill as prepared by the committee there is a provision for thirteen ordnance storekeepers, and six of them are to be also paymasters at the posts where they are stationed. One of these must be at the armory at Springfield. I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the duties of that storekeeper and paymaster at Springfield, and then to ask the House whether it is not reasonable that he shall have the pay of a paymaster of the Army. The House will see that his duties are much larger than those of any paymaster in the Army; and I ask, in connection with that, attention to the peculiar facts regarding his present pay, how it comes to be what it is, what it is, and what it has been for several years.

He is storekeeper for the armory. He has in his custody, and has had for a great many years, about fifteen million dollars' worth of property, four or five times more than is possible for any other storekeeper to have. He has been obliged to pay out during the last four years between four and five million dollars each year. That is a larger amount than he had to pay before the war, and larger than he will have to pay hereafter. He would be obliged to pay, under the present capacity of the armory, if it should be run to its full capacity, that sum; but it is not probable that it will be run to that capacity. He will be obliged to pay every year about two million dollars. He will certainly be obliged to keep now, after the war is closed, a much larger amount of property than during the war, as arms are coming back to the armory every day, and his liability as a storekeeper is therefore very largely increased. In addition to these duties as storekeeper and of paymaster at this armory, he is also commissary at the armory, and is obliged every year to pay out about thirty thousand dollars in that capacity.

Now, he has been obliged to perform all these duties for a salary of $1,250 a year, without any emoluments, without any rations. The salary was fixed by law some time ago; I think it was when the superintendency of the armories was transferred from the military to the civil department.

He has been twenty-five years at that armory, and is an old and experienced man, whose skill and ability in his profession would have secured him almost any position in civil or military life. He has retained his position during the war from a sense of duty, not because he could earn as much money there as he could anywhere else, and from a feeling that after the war was over Congress would do justice to him and raise his compensation.

He has arrived at that period of life when he can hope for no promotion; and situated as he is, as a salaried officer, he is not entitled to any promotion in the Army. He now asks only that he may have the rank and pay of an ordinary paymaster.

I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the present chief of the Ordnance Bureau, who was, during the war, superintendent of the national armory; also a letter from the present superintendent of the armory; and I think they will satisfy the House that this officer ought to be put simply where any other paymaster is put, though his duties and responsibilities are greater than those of any of them.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, February 26, 1866.

SIR: In reply to the inquiry contained in your letter of the 23d instant, I say unhesitatingly that I do not consider the compensation now allowed to military storekeepers and military storekeepers and paymasters of ordnance as a fair remuneration for the services rendered, and the heavy responsibilities which are devolved upon them.

Prior to the passage of the act of August 23, 1842, military storekeepers were allowed the pay and emoluments of captains of infantry, and military storekeepers and paymasters the pay and emoluments of captains of cavalry. This compensation is not too much for the services required of them. Their responsibilities for money and for other property is often very great, and within the last four years their duties and responsibilities have greatly increased.

To cite your own case as an example, during the three years that you were under my command at Springfield armory, your disbursements averaged $5,000,000 a year, and your property responsibility was often greater than that amount. In making payments to the large number of men who were constantly leaving the armory before the pay-rolls could be regularly made, mistakes were unavoidable in over-payments, and in all cases the loss had to be made good by you. It would be only just that your pay should be increased, and I hope that it will be done.

Yours, very truly,
A. B. DYER,
B. M. G., Chief of Ordnance.
EDWARD INGERSOLL, Esq., M. S. K. and P. M., Springfield Armory, Springfield, Massachusetts.

NATIONAL ARMORY,
SPRINGFIELD, March 22, 1866.

SIR: I take pleasure in bearing my testimony to the heavy responsibility devolved upon you as military storekeeper and paymaster at this armory, and the inadequate pay now granted by law for such duties. I am of opinion that the pay given to Army paymasters would not be too great considering the large bonds required of you and the amount of property and funds for which you are held responsible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
T. T. S. LAIDLEY,
Brevet Colonel, Major of Ordnance Commanding,
EDWARD INGERSOLL, Esq., Paymaster U. S. A.

Mr. SCHENCK. I appreciate the motive which induces the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to move this amendment. It is admitted on all hands that these officers have been inadequately paid heretofore; they have, in fact, had less pay than similar officers in the quartermaster's department. They are now receiving, however, one class $1,040 and another class $1,490 per annum, by an increase of $240 per year added to the pay of each class since the law was originally enacted.

The committee propose, in the case of ordnance storekeepers, to increase their rank, pay, and allowances to those of a captain of infantry, which is less than a captain of cavalry receives, and to make six out of the thirteen ordnance storekeepers, who are also acting as and having the responsibilities of paymasters, of the rank and with the pay and emoluments of captains of cavalry, being about one hundred and eighty dollars a year more.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] proposes to make an exception in favor of the ordnance storekeeper and paymaster at Springfield. I admit, while there are six of these thirteen storekeepers who also serve as paymasters, the burden of responsibility upon the one at Springfield is perhaps in some respects as great as of the other five in respect to the amount of property under his charge and the payments he has to make. These storekeepers, who act also as paymasters, expend from about five thousand dollars per month at the two or three western arsenals which have recently been established, one at Rock Island and one at Columbus, up to about two hundred thousand dollars per month, which has been the rate of expenditure at Springfield.

How, if the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to be confined exclusively to making a distinction between the officer at Springfield and the others, I do not know that there ought to be any objection to it. But I think, as a general thing, the allowance proposed to be made to them as captains of cavalry is quite sufficient.

Mr. DAWES. I ought to have added that the officer at Springfield is obliged to give $50,000 bonds, while ordinary paymasters give only $20,000 bonds.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is correct. I would suggest to him that his amendment now speaks of "the paymaster and storekeeper at the national armory;" I think he ought to say, "at Springfield, Massachusetts."

Mr. DAWES. I have modified my amendment in that way.

Mr. SCHENCK. They are all national armories. But this advantage should not be extended to any except that one officer, who has so many more responsibilities than the others.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Why is a distinction made between the military storekeepers in the ordnance department and the storekeepers in the quartermaster's department?

The bill provides that those of the one class shall receive the pay of captains of infantry, while those of the other class receive the pay of captains of cavalry.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very happy to be able to give the gentleman an explanation. The storekeepers in the quartermaster's department, who are to receive only the pay of captains of infantry, do not act also as paymasters. There are sixteen of those; and they are all put upon the same footing. Of military storekeepers in the ordnance department, there are thirteen, seven of whom act simply as storekeepers like those in the quartermaster's department, and they are put on the same footing as to pay with the storekeepers in the quartermaster's department. But six of these military storekeepers in the ordnance department act also as paymasters, and they are put as to pay upon the footing of captains of cavalry, giving them an advantage of perhaps $180 a year in pay and allowances, in order to recompense them for acting as paymasters as well as military storekeepers. No distinction is made, as the gentleman supposes, between the storekeepers in the quartermaster's department and those in the ordnance department. The storekeepers in the ordnance department who act only as military storekeepers are put upon precisely the same footing as storekeepers in the quartermaster's department. The distinction is made only in the case of a half dozen who serve also as paymasters.

Mr. O'NEILL. It seems, then, that the distinction is made on account of the additional responsibility of particular officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. And their additional duties. The distinction has always been made. I will give the gentleman the law on the subject. By a law passed in 1842, the paymasters and military storekeepers at the armories and at the arsenals of construction at Pittsburgh, Watervliet, and Washington city, received $1,250; and all others who served as storekeepers, like those in the quartermaster's department, received $800. But by an act passed in 1857, the sum of $240 per annum was added to officers all round, increasing the compensation of those acting as storekeepers and paymasters to $1,490, and that of the others to $1,040. The distinction exists under the present law; and this bill proposes simply to continue it.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from Massachusetts has urged an increase of pay to the military storekeeper at Springfield on the ground that he performs the duties of paymaster, and is subjected to a large responsibility. Now, I wish to state that there are other officers in the country whose duties as military storekeepers have, during the last few years, imposed on them very great labor and responsibility. Sir, a case in point is that of the storekeeper at the arsenal on the Schuylkill, at Philadelphia. During the last four or five years the quantity of materials stored in that arsenal has at times amounted in value to ten or fifteen million dollars, imposing, of course, a great responsibility upon the storekeeper at that post. I also know that the military storekeeper at Washington has had an almost equal responsibility resting upon him. Why should not the military storekeepers at these two points have an increase of salary? The extent and importance of their duties certainly entitle these officers to a larger pay than the ordinary military storekeepers.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that the difference between the two cases is this: in the case he speaks of the storekeeper had, during the war, the custody of a large amount of property, which is now constantly growing less; while the property in the custody of the storekeeper at Springfield is all the time increasing, as the military stores now go there for safe-keeping. In addition to that, his duties as storekeeper are by no means the whole of his duties. He makes large disbursements of money, equal in amount to those of any ordinary paymaster in the field: He has to perform, also, the duties of a commissary. Those are duties which do not devolve upon the storekeeper either at the Schuylkill arsenal or here in this city. This is the reason why the distinction proposed to be made is just.

I admit the propriety of a provision in the bill that all of these should be raised to that particular point. I only ask the House to consider whether this one should not be provided for, as the others have been paid more than he has been, and who has had far greater responsibility. I hope my friend will not press his amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. I approve of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. But he is mistaken in reference to the Schuylkill arsenal.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to be considered as opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL. The Schuylkill arsenal has been the great distributing arsenal of the country. It has been so since the late war with England. It will still continue to be the receptacle of an immense amount of Government material. It is all under the direction of the military storekeeper. If I am not mistaken it is the duty of that military storekeeper to pay the employes of that arsenal. I think it is a point where we should give this military storekeeper the pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have long since passed the section in reference to military storekeepers.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand the proposition is in reference to military storekeepers.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will turn back to the sixteenth section he will find we there dispose of the quartermaster's department. I am glad it is disposed of. We were a long time at it. In the seventeenth section there is a provision about military storekeepers. We are now on the section providing for the ordnance department. We provide there shall be thirteen ordnance storekeepers, of whom a number not exceeding six may also be appointed and authorized to act as paymasters at armories and arsenals. The proposition is to make a distinction in favor of those who act as paymasters. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to make a still further distinction in favor of the one at Springfield on the ground, which I admit does exist, that his responsibility is to the extent of $50,000,000, while the highest responsibility of the others is $12,000,000, running down to $600,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I thought I was at the proper place to move the amendment. This military storekeeper at the Schuylkill arsenal has greater responsibility than any other military storekeeper, and I do not see why he should not have his pay increased.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to strike out in line thirteen the word "infantry," and insert "cavalry" in lieu thereof. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Military Committee as to the effect of the section. I see it provides for six ordnance storekeepers as paymasters. It provides for thirteen in all. Is it the design that the remaining five shall not act as paymasters?

Mr. SCHENCK. There are six arsenals where the ordnance storekeepers act as paymasters, and we provide only for that number.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one chief signal officer of the Army, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. And the Secretary of War shall have power to detail from the Army six officers, and not to exceed one hundred non-commissioned officers and privates, to be taken from the battalion of engineers, for the performance of signal duty: Provided, That no officer or enlisted man shall be detailed to serve in the signal corps until he shall have been examined and approved by a military board, to be convened by the Secretary of War for that purpose; and officers while so detailed shall receive the pay and emoluments of cavalry officers of their respective grades; and enlisted men while so detailed shall, when deemed necessary, be mounted upon horses provided by the Government.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That in all the staff corps (or departments) promotions may hereafter be made without regard to seniority in the date of appointments or commissions, and the same rule of promotion by merit alone shall apply to all officers of the line above the grade of captain.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the word "above" and insert "below;" and to strike out "captain" and insert "colonel."

Mr. Speaker, there is no good reason why this rule of promotion should not apply to company officers. I am very glad that the committee has undertaken to adopt the principle of promotion by merit. It is an innovation upon the established customs of the Army, and will no doubt throw out some men and work some hardship. But the good that will be accomplished by it is so very great that I believe the section ought to stand with the amendment I have suggested. Where a man has devoted himself for life to the military profession, and has been compelled to serve perhaps five years in a single grade before the promotion comes, it may be said that it is hard that he should not be promoted as a matter of course. But on the other hand, if five years' service has not made him by his merits worthy of a higher grade, he ought not to be promoted.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask the gentleman a single question. His amendment proposes to strike out the word "above" and insert the word "below," and strike out the word "captain" and insert "colonel," so that it will read, "and the same rule of promotion by merit alone shall apply to all officers of the line below the grade of colonel." Does he consider a lieutenant colonel and a major officers of the line, or are they field officers?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly, they are officers of the line.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are too many tinkers about this.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ought to be satisfied, I think, when I consider that the argument of my colleague is an answer and an objection to his own amendment. But I will undertake to extend that objection somewhat by a little further argumentation.

He proposes to reverse the order in which distinction shall be made between promotion by seniority and by merit, so that the first promotions shall be by merit and the subsequent promotions in the higher grade only by seniority. If he does this he will simply reverse the whole order of proceedings in all other services, in any way assimilated to our own, and which exist in the very nature of these military offices.

Now, sir, the reason why promotions in the lower grades are confined to seniority in all services except our own, as far as I know, and that promotion by merit comes in as the officer rises in grade, I take to be this: a young man entering the Army as a second or first lieutenant, on having risen as captain to the command of a company, does not develop that particular genius and power of comprehension or combination which may make him a better field officer. Therefore, in all the various military services of the world they have gone on promoting by seniority alone in the first classes of officers until they reach some point (which we propose shall be above the grade of captain) where the officer is supposed to have developed the fact whether he is fit for a higher trust. Many a man will make a first-rate lieutenant or captain, be perfectly at home in all the routine of company matters and subordinate command, and yet be unfit for the larger and more comprehensive duties of a higher command, either of a regiment, brigade, or division. The gentleman, however, seeks to reverse all this.

To show that I am sustained by the practice of other countries, I beg leave to refer him and the House to what is the practice in all the principal armies of the world. I hold in my hand a report upon this subject made by Major Mordecai, of the United States Army, who with General McClellan and another officer was sent abroad as a commission to look into the military systems of European countries. From this report I find that in Russia—

"Promotions are ordinarily made by seniority. In the guards, promotions are made regimentally to the grade of lieutenant colonel, inclusive; in the infantry of the active army, regimental promotions are made to the rank of captain, inclusive; above that grade the promotion is by divisions of four regiments; in the artillery, the promotions are made by brigades of four batteries; officers of artillery not attached to batteries are promoted separately. Above the grade of colonel, promotions are made through the whole army at the pleasure of the Emperor; so are extraordinary promotions for distinguished services in any grade."

Throughout the whole army any officer who has shown what he is fit for is selected for any higher position purely and solely upon his merits.

I will now refer to another Government in which the army is a very important part of the public service, and where its organization is admitted to have been brought to very great perfection. I refer to Prussia. Major Mordecai says, in his report, in reference to that country—

"Promotions are made according to seniority, and by regiments or corps, to the grade of major, except in case of incompetency on the part of the senior captain to command a battalion. Above the grade of major, the promotions are made by selections; but the order of seniority is habitually followed in time of peace owing partly to the difficulty in such a time of determining real military merit."

We find that in France—

"For brilliant action noticed in general orders promotions are made without regard to the above rules."

The rules referred to relate to the term of service, and the grades a man must be in before he can be promoted. The report goes on—

"And generally, in time of war, the term of service required for promotion may be reduced one half."

Ordinary promotions are made partly by selection by the Emperor, partly by seniority."

Without detaining the House further by referring to these extracts, I may say that the same rule prevails in the military service of every great military nation, and it is founded upon the principle that a man may make a good subaltern, may have all the knowledge necessary for a company officer detailed on subordinate duty up to a certain point, but that there is ordinarily somewhere, if you will have the best selections, when they must be made with reference to merit.

Now, in our own Army during the late war a law was enacted authorizing officers of the regular Army to be commissioned and serve as officers of volunteers; and everywhere throughout the whole extent of that Army of millions of men this principle was resorted to, and selections were made instead of the regular step by step tread-mill promotion, which carries up the dullest and poorest, as well as the best, in regular order. The truth is, the object is to prevent by the regular promotion the inefficient man, or the least efficient, being brought up to the highest positions, thus having your Army die like some old tree at the top and become rotten there while all the vigor is below.

I trust, therefore, that no reversal of this rule will be adopted by the House, and that we shall not abandon the practice as well as the theory of all military Governments in regard to promotions.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, what is the object of inserting in this section these words that seem to exclude captains from that kind of promotion that is given to general and field officers?

If I understand that section there is one rule in regard to general and field officers, that they shall be chosen without any regard to seniority of service. They are selected by the President of the United States, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. Now, I should like to know why a captain if he is a worthy man should not be placed in the same category with field and general officers. He is in the same category the moment he gets above the rank of captain; why should he not be before, if you want to promote a meritorious line of officers?

Mr. SCHENCK. When you speak of the grade above the grade of captain, of course you mean the grade of major, for that is the next grade above. Therefore all these promotions will take place in the ordinary way, by seniority, while officers are yet young, undeveloped in character, and in some degree undeveloped in capacity. But when they become field officers and reach the grade of major, promotions will be made by selections according to merit.

As a matter of course, when a man has been promoted from captain to major, if he be a young major, even the last captain promoted, if he manifests unusual ability and fitness for going higher up, he will be eligible for selection for that purpose. That is the whole meaning of the provision. It is adopting in our military system what, as I have shown the House, has prevailed in the military systems of all other countries. I do not say that the first grade above that of captain is the best point at which to make the line. Perhaps you might say above the grade of major, or above the grade of lieutenant colonel or colonel. But the committee thought that after an officer had served as a subaltern, and as the commander of a company, and had got his first promotion above the grade of captain, and was made a major, he ought after that to expect promotion only according to the efficiency, ability, and fitness for higher and more serious and important commands which he should manifest.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does not the promotion of general or field officers depend upon the arbitrary will of the appointing power?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not now.

Mr. WRIGHT. While a captain has to depend alone upon his merits.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not at all; it is just the reverse. In all the staff corps promotions are hereafter to be made without regard to the seniority of commission or date of appointment; that is, they are to be by merit, and it is proposed that the same rule of promotion, by merit alone, shall apply to all officers of the line above the grade of captain; that is, to majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels. Promotion by seniority will be confined to those who have not got to the grade above that of captain, to all below the grade of major.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am aware that many staff officers have the rank of lieutenant. But in regard to the promotion of line officers, I know of no reason why the captain of a company should not have the same chance of arbitrary selection and promotion as field and general officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I understand the gentleman aright now, he would have this rule of promotion by selection extend through all the grades.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why not?

Mr. SCHENCK. For the simple reason which I have already stated, and there must be some reason in the rule, since it is one which has been adopted in every country where they have military systems which have been built up through centuries. It is for the reason that junior officers, subalterns and company officers, are not presumed to be men who have become developed; it is not to be presumed that any of them will be able to make such show of preëminent ability above their fellows of the same grade as those in other and higher ranks, and therefore they are to be promoted by seniority alone. That is, where there is a vacancy for major, it is to be filled by promoting the oldest captain. Above that grade it is proposed to make promotions according to merit.

Mr. WRIGHT. My objection is this: that in the appointment of regimental staff officers, they may be selected without regard to seniority or term of service, while captains seeking promotion must have a different rule applied to them. This is, in my judgment, an unfair and illiberal distinction.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, I fear very much that in the present temper of the House this section is likely not to receive that attention which I think its importance demands. It proposes to make a radical change in the whole system of promotion in the Army. The system which at present exists has not, I believe, been found so deficient in its workings as to call for so radical a change as this.

We are about to organize the Army upon the basis of a peace establishment; and I trust that many years may elapse before it will be called into active service in the field. It is a serious question whether it would be an improvement upon our military system to make promotions below the grade of colonel by selection instead of by seniority. How is the merit of the officer to be determined? Among the various captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels, it will be very difficult to decide, from the manner in which they perform their duties in garrison or upon the parade ground, which of them are entitled by merit to be promoted over the heads of their seniors.

In time of war military genius makes its way; and during actual hostilities our old system did not prevent those who occupied subordinate positions in the Army from rising in the course of a few months to the very highest rank. That system did not smother the genius of a Sherman or a Grant. Why, then, shall this radical change be made now? What is there in the experience of the past to recommend it as a necessary measure?

I fear that however beautiful the system of selection by merit alone may appear in theory, it will be found in practice to be a system of political favoritism, under which officers will be promoted, not on account of their military merit, but because they happen to have a friend at court. I fear that under this system the officer stationed at some remote place upon the western frontier, having no relatives or friends in Congress or in the Cabinet, will be likely to remain in obscurity with his merit undiscovered; while some more fortunate officer much his junior, who has been enjoying for many years a soft place here in the city of Washington, will, because he happens to have an uncle in the Cabinet, or a brother in Congress, be promoted over the head of his meritorious senior; and that will be called a selection by merit!

If you could determine the value of men as you determine the value of jewels, by their luster or their color; or if you could gauge their value by their weight per pound, like so many bullocks, it would be easy to distinguish which man was entitled to the most consideration, and then you could make selections, as this section proposes they shall be made, exclusively by merit. But what man ever discovered in General Grant when he was a simple lieutenant in the Army the merit which would entitle him to be commander-in-chief of the Army of the United States? What man ever discovered in General Sherman, when he was the principal of a military academy in the Southwest, that he was the man to lead the forces of the United States through the very heart of the rebellion?

It was the merit alone of these men that enabled them to gain the distinction which their country ultimately bestowed upon them. But, sir, it was under the old system that this was achieved. And, sir, when we have before our eyes these illustrious examples of selection by merit, why are we to change the whole system, to reverse the whole order of things in the Army? I believe, sir, that there is nothing which would be more calculated to demoralize the Army than this very measure.

Allusion has been made to the practice of foreign countries; and among others that of France has been cited. I happen to know, however, that the selections which are made for promotion in the French army are made very differently from the manner in which they would be made in this country, if the system proposed by this bill should be adopted without incorporating in the bill anything else to assimilate it to the system in the French army. In the French army the promotions for merit are made upon the recommendation of a board of officers of the army. That part of the French system is not incorporated into this bill.

If hereafter promotion by selection is to embrace all ranks above that of captain, or, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] all below as well as above that grade, I think the injurious effects of this system should be obviated by incorporating into it that which is deemed necessary for its proper, efficient, and beneficial working in the French army. Let, then, a board of officers be established, (composed of officers of the Army, not of politicians,) empowered to recommend their juniors for promotion. Let the men selected by a disinterested and capable board like that be the persons promoted by merit, if merit alone is to be the criterion. But as it is the practical result will be that the professed object of this section of the bill will be defeated. Instead of promotion by merit it will be a system of nepotism and favoritism throughout. I am therefore opposed to this section, and also to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and if it be in order I will now make the motion that this section be stricken out of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move that the section be stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out, the vote will of course be taken on the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. BOYER. I do not make the motion now, and of course do not wish to cut off any amendment to the section.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has spoken of that which is the objection to this system which I propose, and I admit it is to a limited and to a certain extent true of the present system. Like all other changes, the question is whether the result is loss or gain by departing from the present condition of things. If, on the one hand, you make promotion in any part of the Army by selection made upon men's merit it is liable to the possible abuse of which the gentleman speaks, that there may be partiality, but so far as examinations are concerned, if he will look at the thirty-fourth section he will find we have provided promotion below the rank of colonel shall be on examination by a board of officers as he recommends, not of politicians, not of outsiders, but a board composed of members of the Army.

The answer to that objection which may be made, the objection of promotion being made through partiality, is that in every human system we must trust somebody. Everything rests somewhere. The necessity of obedience to law is with those who are to carry it out. You may devise every expedient you can, and you will be scarcely able to get rid of that. While there is a fear of partiality and abuse on one side, look at what may be considered a greater disadvantage if you do not have some rule of this kind, found expedient to be adopted in every country which has had a successful military system except our own. The difficulty into which you run, if you do not make it limited, is this: if all promotion is to be by seniority, the oldest captain will be major in his turn, the oldest major lieutenant colonel, and the oldest lieutenant colonel, as a matter of course, colonel; and so all the way through, step by step; and inefficiency and incapacity are sure to result.

The gentleman was unfortunate in his illustrations, I think, drawn from experience during the last war, which experience has aided us in bringing our attention to this particular subject. He referred to Grant and Sherman and others who have distinguished themselves as great leaders in the war, prominent above all others. How did they come to have their services secured in these high places? Most of these gentlemen had left the Army, these two particularly had, while others remained in the regular Army. They got appointed as field officers, some as colonels, some as lieutenant colonels, both these officers as colonels, and were found on trial to develop such qualities they were speedily made general officers, and from general officers of subordinate positions advanced by development of capacity over all others until they became chosen the leaders of the war. And thus men far below in age, in previous rank, and in date of former commission, by the very exigencies of the service and by force of this rule which we propose you shall now adopt to a certain extent throughout the Army, are brought at the head who are admitted on all hands to be those who ought to be at the head.

The illustration is not a good one for the gentleman's argument, it seems to me, but it sustains precisely what I am saying. And without extending the argument further, I would say that we have learned, I think, by sad experience a great deal during this war with all its lessons and among other things we have learned that there is good reason and good cause for the adoption of this rule of promotion by merit and selection, above certain grades at least, as it exists in other armies, and we would do well, perhaps, to introduce it into our own.

The gentleman says it is, to a certain extent, a radical change. I admit it. There is argument on both sides, and the gentleman has presented very fairly the argument against it. But I submit to him and to the House whether there is not more to be gained than to be lost by the change; whether the danger is not, if we continue with a still larger army, as we have heretofore, when it has not been so much felt, with a very small army in time of peace, making promotions step by step, by seniority alone, we may not find a large number of those highest in command among the worn-out, effete, and imbecile officers of the Army, instead of the most vigorous, best, and most gifted.

Mr. BOYER. I cannot admit, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] seems to think, that I have been unfortunate in my illustrations. The cases of Generals Grant and Sherman were cited by me for the purpose of illustrating the fact that even under our present system of promotion by seniority, great and shining merit could find its way to the surface. In time of war the regular system of promotion by seniority is to a great extent disregarded, as it has been throughout the whole course of the late war. And I was willing to admit, too, that if we were always to be at war, then the system proposed by this bill is the very one which ought to be adopted. Amid the storm of war military merit makes itself evident, and enables us to distinguish truly when the junior should command the senior.

But we are now preparing an army for a peace establishment, and I say that it is not a good general rule in time of peace to select for promotion otherwise than by seniority.

And I do not think there is much weight, with all due deference to the argument of the gentleman, in the suggestion that we are likely to be overburdened with inefficient and incompetent officers; for you have your examining and retiring boards to enable you to rid the Army of all that sort of material under the operation of the existing system.

Then again, the section which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] points out as the remedy of the evils which are complained of as likely to result under the system which he would introduce, namely, section thirty-four, does not provide at all, as he asserts it does, for a board of examiners composed of Army officers to make selections for promotions, but it provides in these words:

That no officer of the Army below the rank of colonel shall hereafter be promoted to a higher grade before having passed a satisfactory examination as to his fitness for promotion and record of past services before a board of three general officers, or officers of his corps or arm of service senior to him in rank.

It will be perceived that this board is to decide upon the fitness of officers for promotion. But they do not decide as to the respective merits of the different officers who may appear before the board, but only in general terms as to the fitness or unfitness for promotion. Having received the certificate of such an examining board, a young officer may grow gray before he receives the promotion for which they certify he is fitted.

Now, one of the great evils which will pervade this system thus sought to be introduced into the Army, will be that whenever a vacancy occurs there will be a strife among the various officers as to who is entitled by merit to promotion to fill the vacancy.

In a regiment, for example, where a colonelcy is to be filled, every captain in the regiment will consider himself entitled by merit to supersede not only the other captains but the major and the lieutenant colonel; and thus, in every regiment where a vacancy occurs, and as often as it occurs, there will be a scene of jealousy, strife, and intrigue calculated to lead eventually to the demoralization of the Army, and to the destruction of that esprit du corps which it is absolutely necessary should be preserved if we desire that our Army shall continue to be in the future what it has been in the past.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the point in debate. The gentleman says that, notwithstanding the proposition made by the committee in this bill, we have seen notable examples during the late war in which the old system has given us the very best talent in the country. I answer that by a single fact, and that fact is, that all the examples he has given have been in defiance of the old custom in the Army and under special legislation that broke the old rule of promotion by seniority. If the rule of seniority had obtained throughout the war, not one of the leading men who occupied, and are occupying, high places in the Army could have occupied those places. Half a dozen of those who are major generals would have been majors yet but for the fact that the rule of seniority was entirely overlooked. It was found necessary in the progress of the war to enact a law that the President might assign a junior officer to the command of his seniors. It became absolutely necessary. We had some men who had grown old in the service, and it would not do, according to the old custom in the Army, to let a junior officer command them. Congress, therefore, passed an act providing that whenever the President of the United States saw fit he might assign any general officer, without regard to his rank, to the command of a department or an Army corps, and that officer might command his seniors. Thus, the rule of seniority was broken down regularly and systematically by law, to enable us to get hold of the best intellects of the country and put them into the service.

Observe another thing. This rule of seniority has always been broken down by great commanders wherever great emergencies of war were upon them. For instance, in 1798-99, when we expected war with France, Washington was appointed General-in-Chief of the Army, and he made it a condition to his acceptance of that position that he, himself, should have the selection of his leading officers. When he came to make his selection he made Alexander Hamilton, a man taken from civil life, and who had never been higher than a colonel in the Army, first in the rank of major general; he made Pinckney, of South Carolina, second in rank, and he made General Knox, who had been a commander of division in the war of the Revolution, third in rank; thus absolutely reversing the order, and placing those men in that order solely on the ground of merit, and not on the ground of seniority.

The great success of Napoleon Bonaparte was due, mainly, to the fact that he utterly ignored the rule of seniority. It is true, he paid this much deference to the rule, that if he wanted a corporal made a captain he promoted him to be a sergeant one day, a second lieutenant the next day, a first lieutenant the next, and a captain the next; but he went through the form only out of respect to a time-honored custom. I affirm, and I wish it understood by every gentleman, that no great and successful army was ever called into the field in the history of war, but what had its officers selected in defiance of the rule of seniority, and upon the principle of merit.

Now, the only difference between the chairman of the committee and myself is that I do not think he has gone far enough in the application of his rule of merit. I think the rule should be made to apply to captains and lieutenants as well as to officers above them.

And for the purpose of effecting that object I desire to modify my amendment so as to make it a motion to strike out the words "above the grade of captain." That would make the rule of promotion by merit alone universal throughout the Army; and that is what I desire.

Now I desire to say one word on that point before I yield the floor. The gentleman has said that we cannot always judge what a man will be until we have had time to test him. Therefore when a man has risen by seniority to the grade of captain, we cannot tell whether there is anything in him or not. Now, my answer to that is, that in the thirty-fourth section of this bill it is provided that there shall be competitive examinations for officers even below the grade of major, and they are to be promoted only as they shall show themselves to be proficient. And I want that principle adopted here.

Another point: the gentleman says we want men in the Army awhile before we can decide upon their merits. I know that it has under the old rule sometimes taken a man twenty years to reach the grade of major by the rule of promotion by seniority. At the time of the commencement of the late war there were many captains in the Army who had been twenty years in the service. Their merits had become perfectly well known.

As we are now entering upon a time of peace, a man will probably be a second lieutenant on an average for four or five years, which certainly will allow time enough to discover all the capacity there is in him. If young men who are commissioned second lieutenants do not make sufficient improvement in the vigor of their youth, when they can best improve themselves, during the three, or four, or five, or ten years that they are company officers, they certainly ought not to be promoted.

I hope, therefore, that the principle of promotion by merit or examination will be applied to all, and I modify my amendment to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I am not sure but I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I ought perhaps in modesty to recite the old Latin maxim—is it?—"Non nostrum inter vobiscum lites componere." [Laughter.] I think that is Latin. [Renewed laughter.] I do not know that I ought to mingle in this quarrel between these high generals, having never been anything more than a second lieutenant myself. But I want to make this suggestion, that the system of giving promotion by seniority of rank comes from the old English system, and is founded, I think, upon a vicious principle. In England, by means of purchasing commissions, a nobleman who has younger sons, and desires to place them where they can secure a support for life, with a certainty of promotion, purchases commissions for them at from two to three thousand pounds each. Those commissions are salable by the officers holding them. Now, it would not do to have these vested rights broken in upon by allowing promotions or even appointments to be made for merit alone, and hence, until you get to the higher grades in the British army, promotions are never made for merit, but only by seniority. That is a system devised by the nobility for the support of those for whom they have purchased commissions. But it is a system with which we in America ought to have nothing to do. We cannot afford to make our original appointments by the sales of commissions; nor can we allow those who hold commissions to transfer them by sale, and thus make a large amount of money out of them. That being the case, there is but one other system which we can adopt, and that is the system of promotion by merit, and I think we ought to apply the system to the lowest ranks.

I hope I shall be excused for venturing to make these remarks upon a question that I may be supposed to know nothing about, and I am willing to confess it. As I am requested to call the previous question, I will do so.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes thirty-two, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. BOYER, to strike out the twenty-eighth section, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That the President is authorized to transfer officers of the Army of the United States from the line to the general staff, and from the general staff to the line, or from one staff corps of the general staff to another and different staff corps, or from one arm of the service to another; but an officer on being so transferred shall only take such rank in the staff or corps in which he is placed as he held by commission in the staff or line before his transfer.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That the age for the admission of cadets to the United States Military Academy shall hereafter be between seventeen and twenty-two years; but any person who has served two years as a volunteer in the Union Army, in the late war, may be eligible to appointment up to the age of twenty-four years.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That cadets at the Military Academy shall hereafter be appointed one year in advance of the time of their admission, except in cases where by reason of death, or other cause, a vacancy occurs which cannot thus be provided for by such appointment in advance; but no pay or allowance shall be made to any such appointee until he shall be regularly admitted on examination, as now provided by law. And in addition to the requirements necessary for admission as provided by the third section of the "act making further provisions for the corps of Engineers," approved April 20, 1812, candidates shall be required to have a knowledge of the elements of English grammar, of descriptive geography, particularly of our own country, and of the history of the United States.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy may hereafter be selected, and the officers on duty at that institution detailed, from any arm of the service; and the supervision and charge of the Academy shall be in the War Department, under such officer or officers as the Secretary of War may assign to that duty.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no officer of the Army, in time of peace, shall be dismissed the service unless in accordance with the provisions of this act or by sentence of a court-martial duly approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That immediately after the passage of this act the President of the United States shall convene a council of officers to assemble at Washington city, which council shall be composed of three general officers of the Army, three officers of infantry, two officers of artillery, two officers of cavalry, two officers of the medical department, one officer of the Adjutant General's department, one officer of engineers, one officer of ordnance, one officer of the quartermaster's department, one officer of the subsistence department, and one officer of the pay department; all to be selected for their high character for intelligence, discretion, justice, patriotism, and professional ability, and who, being thus selected, shall be retained on the Army list. It shall be the duty of this council to inquire into and consider the capacity, character, record of services, and fitness to be continued in the military service of every officer below the grade of brigadier general who may be in the Army at the time of the passage of this bill; and with a view to this they shall be furnished with all information, papers, records, and other documentary evidence they may require from the War Department. As they proceed with this investigation, they shall, from time to time, report all their conclusions in each case to the Secretary of War. When the report of a majority of the council is not adverse in the case of any officer, he shall thereupon be immediately marked on the Army list to be retained in the service in the position or rank which he is then holding, of which due notice shall be given in general orders; but if the majority of the council report that in their opinion, and for reasons which they shall assign, the case of any officer ought to be further inquired into, he shall thereupon be summoned, by order, to appear before a board, to consist of three general officers or officers of his corps or arm of the service, senior to him in rank, to undergo further examination. On such examination, besides other inquiry as to his capacity and qualifications, mental, moral, and physical, the officer shall be allowed, if the case requires it, full and reasonable opportunity for explanation and defense, and may produce witnesses and other testimony to meet any objections or charges made against him. If the board thereupon report that he is not qualified to remain in the Army, for reasons other than any which involve bad moral character, he shall be placed on the retired list, as is provided in other cases for the retirement of Army officers, and on the same conditions; but if he be found unfit for the service on account of moral disqualifications, he shall at once be dropped from the rolls of the Army. And in making such investigations into the fitness of officers to be retained in the service, the said military council and such boards as may at any time be appointed and organized under the provisions of this section, shall take into account the cases of any who may have been employed in no active duty in the field during any part of the late war, and shall inquire specially into the reasons for their not being so employed; and any officer whose absence from active field service during the war shall be decided by a board of examiners, after full hearing, to have been on account of his sympathy with the rebellion or his unwillingness to serve actively against the so-called confederate States, or any particular State, or the people of any State engaged in rebellion, shall be reported the same as if found morally disqualified for the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Inspector General's department is not represented in the council of officers according to the present provisions of the section. I move, therefore, to amend by inserting after the word "department," where it occurs the second time in the tenth line, the words "and one officer of the Inspector General's department," and by striking out in the same line the word "and;" so that the clause will read:

Which council shall be composed of three general officers of the Army, three officers of infantry, two officers of artillery, two officers of cavalry, two officers of the medical department, one officer of the Adjutant General's department, one officer of engineers, one officer of ordnance, one officer of the quartermaster's department, one officer of the subsistence department, one officer of the pay department, and one officer of the Inspector General's department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That no officer of the Army below the rank of colonel shall hereafter be promoted to a higher grade before having passed a satisfactory examination as to his fitness for promotion and record of past services before a board of three general officers or officers of his corps or arm of service, senior to him in rank; and should the officer fail at said examination, he shall be suspended from promotion for one year, when, if he still desires promotion, he shall, upon application, be reexamined, and upon a second failure shall be dropped from the rolls of the Army: Provided, That if any officer be found unfit for promotion on account of moral disqualifications, he shall not be entitled to a reexamination.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, some representations have been made to me by officers of the Army who have distinguished themselves during the late war as to the possible working of this section, and the propriety of an amendment to guard against possible injustice. In conformity with the suggestions made to me, I move to amend by striking out in the sixth line the words, "senior to him in rank," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "who have served as seniors to him in rank during the late war against the rebellion;" so that the clause will read:

That no officer of the Army below the rank of colonel shall hereafter be promoted to a higher grade before having passed a satisfactory examination as to his fitness for promotion and record of past services before a board of three general officers or officers of his corps or arm of service, who have served as seniors to him in rank during the late war against the rebellion.

I will state the reason for proposing this amendment. Some officers who formerly served as captains or majors, or held other subordinate positions in regiments; have acted as brigadier and major generals during the late war, while their former colonels or lieutenant colonels have not been selected for any such command, being supposed to be not quite so well fitted as their juniors, or not quite so young and capable as it was desirable they should be for the efficiency of the service. Now, these gentlemen who may apply for colonelcies, or any higher grade of position in the extension of the Army, do not wish to be examined by officers senior to them in rank who did not serve during the war, and whose sympathies would not probably be with them.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he is not taking away from the President and Senate their prerogative to appoint, nominate, and confirm. The gentleman refuses to answer, and I hope the section will be voted out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be appointed an officer in the line or in any staff corps of the Army until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board, to be convened under direction of the Secretary of War, who shall inquire into and take account of the services rendered during the late war, as well as the capacity and qualifications otherwise of the applicant; and such appointment, when made, shall be without regard to previous rank, but with sole regard to qualifications and meritorious services.

Sec. 36. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of promoting knowledge of military science among the young men of the United States, the President may, upon the application of an established college or university within the United States, with sufficient capacity to educate at one time not less than one hundred and fifty male students, detail an officer of the Army to act as president, superintendent, or professor of such college or university; that the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed twenty at any time, and shall be appointed through the United States, as nearly as practicable, according to population, and shall be governed by general rules, to be prescribed from time to time by the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the following to come in as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That whenever troops are serving at any post, garrison, or permanent camp, there shall be established a school where all enlisted men may be provided with instruction in the common English branches of education and especially in the history of the United States; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to detail such commissioned and non-commissioned officers as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. Speaker, I only ask to say a word on that subject. One of the greatest evils known in standing armies is the evil of idleness, the parent of all wickedness, and especially the ignorance connected with it. I hope we will be able to do something to eradicate that evil from our Army, and to do something to make it a patriotic Army. In the wearisome months spent in camp and at posts and garrisons there is nothing for them to do but to indulge in some devilry. It is a great evil in the Army. I want the enlisted men to have opportunities for culture, and I ask that the Secretary of War shall detail officers fitted for that purpose. I think such a section will relieve the Army from this evil. It has been drawn hastily, but I think will commend itself to the country.

One word more. If it were in my power I would make a law that every man and woman in the United States should study American history through the period of their minority. We cannot do that throughout the United States generally, but we can enforce it to some extent upon the privates in our Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to incorporate this section into the bill. I only advise the House and the gentleman who offers it that I have a long bill proposing a radical change to take place gradually in our whole system. The purpose will be indicated by reading its title. It is an act to establish a system of education in the regular Army of the United States, and provide that all promotions therein shall begin from the rank and file. As this is not to be presented now, but a matter for future consideration, I do not object to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 37. And be it further enacted, That any person applying for a commission under the authority of this act, and having permission to appear before a board of examiners, shall be entitled, in case of passing the examination and being appointed or commissioned, to receive mileage from his place of residence to the place of examination, or such portion of that distance as he may actually travel, the same as is paid to officers traveling under orders, but shall be paid no other compensation.

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That the allowance now made by law to officers traveling under orders, where transportation is not furnished in kind, shall be increased to ten cents per mile.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section, to come in after section thirty-eight:

And be it further enacted, That the provision in section fifteen of the act approved July 5, 1833, giving to certain officers an additional ration per diem for each five years of service, shall be construed to apply to all officers or soldiers of volunteers who may be commissioned in the regular Army, and the date of the original entrance of the officers or soldiers in the volunteer service shall be the date from which the period of five years shall be reckoned.

I understand that the committee have no objection to this amendment. The object of it is to secure a credit to the gallant men who have served in the volunteer Army during the war if they shall be appointed in the regular Army, so that they may obtain the additional ration. I think it is just and proper that they should have the credit. They will have been in actual service for some years, and deserve the credit that this amendment proposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. If section thirty-eight remains in the bill I have no objection to this amendment to it. It has been my purpose, however, to move to strike out that section altogether, and for this reason: it relates to pay and allowances, and that very provision is contained in another bill that we have reported called the pay bill, which has been made a special order in this House. Both the thirty-eighth section and the amendment which the gentleman proposes would be very appropriate in that bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is the safest course to put it in this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. If that bill should not pass I would rather have the amendment in this bill. The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following sections:

SEC. 39. And be it further enacted, That in construing this bill, officers who have heretofore been appointed or commissioned to serve with United States colored troops shall be deemed and held to be officers of volunteers.

SEC. 40. And be it further enacted, That officers of the regular Army, who have also held commissions as officers of volunteers, shall not on that account be held to be volunteers under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose after section forty to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize or permit the appointment to any position or office in the Army of the United States of any person who has served in any capacity in the military or naval service of the so-called confederate States during the late rebellion, but any such appointment shall be held illegal and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have an amendment to offer as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all leaders of bands of music in the United States Army, who now have the pay of second lieutenants, shall be styled band-masters, with the privilege of wearing the shoulder straps of a second lieutenant with a lyre thereon to indicate their position: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall add to the rank, pay, or emoluments of such band-masters.

I have the honor to submit this to the chairman of the committee. I presume that in the reorganization of the Army, apart from the general matters that attract the attention of the House, some minor details are necessary. This does not increase the rank of these persons, who are really officers, drawing the pay of second lieutenants, but their pride, I presume, might be gratified and their position known by the wearing of a shoulder strap with some of the insignia of military office upon it. It does not, I admit, amount to much, but we are all of us men, and the poorest among us have some personal pride, and therefore I would like to have this amendment adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman's amendment not to propose any increase of pay.

Mr. WRIGHT. None whatever.

Mr. SCHENCK. Simply a badge.

Mr. WRIGHT. Simply that we may know who are band-masters in the United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. I offer the following amendment, to come in as an additional section after the section which has just been passed:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an instructor of sword exercise with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry; that said instructor of sword exercise shall be a thorough practical swordsman, conversant with both cavalry and infantry sword drill, and be distinguished for capacity, efficiency, and experience as an instructor; that he shall carry out such regulations for perfecting the officers of the Army in the use of the sword as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The forty-first section was then read as follows:

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect in any way the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, as now established by law.

Mr. GRINNELL. I offer the following to come in as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting the existing law respecting the rank, pay, and allowances of chaplains of the Army, but the same shall remain as now established by the act entitled "An act to amend section nine of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled 'An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army,' and for other purposes," approved April 9, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

The forty-second and last section of the bill was then read as follows:

SEC. 42. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

No further amendments being offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to one hour to close the debate, if he desire to do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to submit some little explanation of the bill before the vote is taken. I do not propose to debate it at length. There has been enough of incidental debate in its progress through the House. The bill, as reported by the committee, has not been in any respect materially altered by any of the amendments that have been made. Its general scope and purposes remain about the same as I indicated they were when the bill was first introduced and submitted for consideration; and it cannot be pretended that full and fair opportunity for amendment and discussion has not been allowed upon each section of the bill in its progress through the House.

The bill, it will be remembered, is one which provides, now when the time has arrived for us to determine what our Army shall be in the future, for an establishment to consist of fifty thousand men, capable of expansion to eighty-two thousand, as the ultimate or maximum number. The bill, in its various provisions, is a most liberal one in relation to introducing into this Army those who have served with fidelity and efficiency in the late struggle for the preservation of this Government. It throws the doors wide open for the admission of volunteers.

Perhaps gentlemen are not fully aware of what is the present character, even with the changes already made, of the regular Army of the United States as it relates to the material of which its officers are made up, or of what it would be if this bill should become a law, and the Army be eventually reorganized under its provisions.

I have here some tables, which I will not detain the House by giving in detail, but which contain some interesting statistics in relation to this subject, and such as may perhaps be new, even to many members of the House.

Let me take, in the first place, the present staff corps of the Army. It consists, including general officers, of a total of three hundred and twenty-seven. Of those, two hundred and fifty-six in the different staff departments are graduates of the United States Military Academy. They are divided in this way:

In the Adjutant General's department, where there are twenty-one officers, three are not graduates, and eighteen graduates.

In the quartermaster's department there are twenty-six who have not been educated at West Point, and thirty-nine who have been.

In the subsistence department, out of twenty-nine as a total, two have not been graduates, or are not now on the Army list, while twenty-seven have been.

I may here remark that this list was taken from the present Army Register of the 1st of January, 1866, and it should contain the names or two other officers who have been appointed in the subsistence department from among the commissaries of volunteers. So that there are really four who are not graduates.

In the pay department seventeen are not graduates, and ten are.

In the Engineer corps the whole number employed are graduates of West Point.

And so on until we reach the total which is given as I before recited it.

Among the general officers in the Army, as it now exists, we have a lieutenant general, who is a graduate of the Military Academy, five major generals, all graduates, and nine brigadier generals, eight of whom are graduates, and one of whom, General Terry, is not a graduate. The list which I have here shows only eight brigadier generals; being taken from the Army Register of last January it does not contain the name of General Terry. Thus it will be seen that the staff departments proper, with the exception of the quartermaster's department to a considerable extent, and the pay department and ordnance department to some extent, are made up of those who have been educated at the Military Academy.

But a change has commenced in the line, and is extending upward through the different grades of officers; and it may astonish gentlemen to learn that as the Army now stands, of a total of eleven hundred and twenty-four officers of the line, in the three arms of the service—cavalry, artillery, and infantry—only two hundred and eighty-four have been graduates of the Military Academy; while eight hundred and forty have been appointed from among volunteers or directly from civil life.

But there are vacancies which are not included in my list, which have recently been and are now being filled, of a number of first and second lieutenants, which will make the relative proportion still different. Of five hundred and sixty-four vacancies to be filled, the whole of them are to be filled by appointments from volunteers. The bill before the House, without reference to what the Army will be when these five hundred and sixty-four vacancies are filled, provides for six hundred and thirty subaltern officers, who will also all be taken from the volunteers.

Thus going on through the different items in this table, I find as the general aggregate, if this bill shall pass, that the whole number of officers, in all arms of the service, will be two thousand seven hundred and eighty, of whom two thousand four hundred and thirty-two, being the entire number with the exception of three hundred and forty-eight who are graduates of the Military Academy, will be appointed either directly from civil life or for the most part from among those who have served as volunteers in the late war.

The following are the tables to which I have referred:

THE STAFF CORPS.

Number of officers in the several staff corps of the Army according to the Army Register for 1865.

Corps or department.	Graduates.	Non-Graduates.	Total.
Adjutant General's department.....	18	3	21
Quartermaster's department.....	39	26	65
Subsistence department.....	27	2	29
Pay department.....	10	17	27
Corps of Engineers.....	86	-	86
Ordnance department.....	54	20	74
Bureau of Military Justice.....	-	2	2
Inspectors General.....	8	1	9
General Officers:
Lieutenant general.....	242	71	313
Major generals.....	1	-	1
Brigadier generals.....	5	-	5
Total.....	256	71	327

The Army Register for 1865 shows that there are eleven hundred and twenty-four officers of all grades in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry regiments of the United States Army, divided as follows:

	Graduates.	Non-Graduates.	Total.
In the six regiments of cavalry, all grades.....	54	154	208
In the five regiments of artillery, all grades.....	102	185	237
In the nineteen regiments of infantry, all grades.....	128	551	679
The following vacancies existed (January 1, 1865,) in the same regiments, and have been filled, or are now being filled, by officers of the volunteer service, namely, cavalry, 56; artillery, 98; infantry, 410.....	284	840	1,124
The bill now before the House provides for eighteen new regiments of infantry, to be officered exclusively by appointments from the volunteer service.....	-	564	564
In the fifty-four companies to be added to the twenty-seven battalions of infantry now in the service, all officers of the grades of first and second lieutenants are to be from officers of volunteers.....	-	630	630
Two thirds of all other grades from volunteers.....	-	108	108
In the six new regiments of cavalry, there will be 234 officers, divided as follows: all first and second lieutenants and two thirds of all other grades from volunteers.....	30	60	90
	34	230	264
	348	2,432	2,780

The object of this bill, therefore, it will be seen, is to make a volunteer Army as it were, so far as deriving the material which is to compose the number of its officers is concerned. I mention this matter, because objection is made to an extension of the Army at this time, or to the creation of an Army at all.

Now, in regard to the extension of the Army, I have only to say, it has become, in the opinion at least of those who have charge of the military affairs of the country, and of the Department presiding over those military affairs, an absolute necessity to have something done which shall increase our regular Army, and put it upon that more extended footing which it is to have if the wants and needs of the Government are to be supplied.

The House may not be aware of the gradual diminution of the volunteer Army. I have statistics upon the subject, which I will state briefly. Even while we have been progressing with this bill volunteers have been necessarily mustered out of service from the expiration of their terms of enlistment and the necessity of treating them at the close of hostilities as entitled to their discharge, until there remained on the 18th of April only twelve thousand two hundred and one white volunteers and eighteen thousand three hundred and fifty-eight colored volunteers, or a total of thirty thousand five hundred and fifty-nine volunteers, out of an army of one million five hundred and sixteen men which we had in the service at the close of the war.

Let me restate it. At the close of the war we had an army of regulars and volunteers of one million five hundred and sixteen men. Of these, fifteen thousand were regulars, leaving a total of volunteers in service at the close of the war of nine hundred and eighty-five thousand five hundred and sixteen. Of these there have been mustered out to the 18th of last month, until the number remaining was only thirty thousand five hundred and fifty-nine. And since the 18th of April there are known to have been mustered out of service because of expiration of terms of service and of orders already issued about fifteen hundred men. Perhaps another five hundred should be added to that number for the past week, for these statistics are a week old. But counting these fifteen hundred only, it will be seen that the volunteer force of the Army, including colored as well as white troops, has been reduced to twenty-nine thousand and fifty-nine men.

This leaves, therefore, scarcely anything to be relied upon except the regular Army, and nothing whatever to be relied upon after a few weeks more. It is natural, therefore, that those having charge of the military service of the country should be turning their eyes anxiously in the direction of Congress to see what is to be done in order to provide a sufficient army for all the needs of the Government, whether on the frontier or throughout the interior of the country, or upon our widely-extended coast, wherever garrisons are kept up.

The present strength of the regular Army, in consequence of the more rapid enlistments since the discharge of the volunteers, is about thirty thousand. There can be an extension altogether to the number of from forty-two to forty-three thousand, which is the entire limit of the present regular Army. In the course of a few months, or even weeks, we shall find ourselves entirely destitute of any volunteer force whatever under the operation of the orders already existing, and unless some bill be passed to continue in service the colored troops and other troops, we shall find ourselves with an army which at its maximum can be only a little over forty thousand.

Now, sir, admitting the necessity of a military establishment, extended to meet the requirements of the country, and equal to that which we are told from the headquarters of the Army, and from the Military Department itself, is absolutely essential, the next question is whether this is an appropriate time for creating such an army. I hold that this is a peculiarly appropriate time. We are now in the transition state from war to a peace establishment. We have now in the country an abundance of skilled officers and skilled soldiers. We have above all a proposition to embody into an army system a number of officers constituting the great bulk of that army, who will enter the new organization fresh from this war to suppress the rebellion, and full of all the sympathies, all the sentiments, all the love of country, and all the zeal to maintain at all hazards the honor of the flag and the integrity of the country in all time hereafter, which they learned in their experience and in their noble service during the late war.

I hold, therefore, that adopting as we do a system of examinations so that officers shall be thoroughly tried as to their merit, including their efficiency and fidelity in the service in which they have been so lately engaged, we can select no better time to put into the independent position of officers who will hold their offices during good behavior a body of men thoroughly adapted to maintain and defend our institutions through all time to come, than now when we can make up that army from men fresh from the field of war, on which they have nobly defended our institutions and the integrity of our Government.

Sir, I do not propose to extend these remarks. I wish merely to call the attention of the House to these two propositions: that, in the first place, the army which we propose to create is an army no greater than is proportioned, according to the judgment of all those best qualified to judge of the matter, to the needs of the country in its extended interests; and in the next place that this army in its component character is made up of those who have served the country faithfully, and who thus have been imbued with such sentiments of devotion to the country and its flag and all its highest interests as will make them the best possible material from which to select such an army.

Mr. Speaker, I now call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now to move to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the previous question should not be seconded.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question should not be sustained, that motion can be made.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 57, noes 28; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and BOYER.

The House was again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. BOYER. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. TAYLOR. If this bill be laid upon the table, then what will be the position of the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, and let the vote be taken on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BOYER. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 36, nays 88, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Garfield, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Paine, Patterson, Piatts, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Stevens, Stilwell, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, and Williams—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Darling, Dawson, Deftrees, Delano, Denison, Dodge, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Hotchkiss, James R. Hubbell, Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lo Blond, Loan, Marshall, McClurg, McRuer, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Niblack, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John E. Rice, Ross, Shanklin, Schellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, James E. Wilson, Stephen E. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—88.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brownwell, Cook, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Kaykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Marston, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John I. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Burt Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, and Woodbridge—64.

So the bill was rejected.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BAXTER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WOODBRIDGE, who, if present, would vote against the bill, while I would vote for it.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state that I am paired with Mr. THAYER, who would vote against the bill, while I would vote for it.

I am also requested to state that Mr. BINGHAM, who would vote for the bill, is paired, but I cannot recollect with whom.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. On this question I am paired with Mr. J. L. THOMAS.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. RITTER, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. ANCONA. My colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, who is absent on account of sickness, is paired with Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I know that Mr. JOHNSON would vote against the bill, but I do not know how Mr. HOOPER would vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that will be postponed for the present, as I want to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rose before the motion was made to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair acted in accordance with the uniform usage of the House in recognizing a gentleman who voted with the successful side.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] changed his vote in order to move a reconsideration. I hope the bill will go over till to-morrow. I want the volunteer officers and soldiers of the country who are waiting in expectation—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to debate.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at half past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BAXTER: The petition of J. G. Saxe, and 80 others, asking that a mail route may be established from the depot in Georgia, to Cambridge, Lamoille county, Vermont.

Also, the petition of Erastus Kelley, and 39 others, citizens of Clarendon Springs, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on wool.

Also, the petition of George C. Dana, and 67 others, citizens of Weybridge, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on foreign wool.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received, and been requested to present to the Senate, a memorial signed by many dress-makers in different parts of the United States, praying for a modification of the present tax upon their business. They represent that so far as taxing their labor is concerned; though that would be onerous at the present time in view of their compensation, they would be willing to submit to that; but a tax of six per cent. upon the materials, costly trimmings, &c., that go through their hands purchased by their employers, makes an amount of expenditure on their part so large that their business, if the tax is continued, will be absolutely destroyed, and they beg that the tax on their manufactures may be repealed. This petition will be received, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES. I present a petition from Admiral S. W. Godon, acting rear admiral in charge of the Brazil squadron, and the other line and staff officers of the Navy attached to that squadron, who represent that the pay for naval officers was established free from tax, at a period when the currency of the country was gold and silver; that even at that time it was not more than sufficient to meet their necessary expenses, and left them without the prospect of providing for old age or misfortune; that since that period the cost of the necessities of life has more than doubled in many instances; that this increase of cost has been provided for in civil employment by a corresponding increase of salaries, while the naval officers, compelled by the discipline of the Navy to preserve the appearance of officers at whatever cost, have been forced, in many instances, to incur debts and suffer family privations, which they have endeavored to conceal from the public during the rebellion, with the hope that after its suppression either the cost of the necessities of life would be reduced to its former amount, or that Congress would, in their sense of justice, make such an addition to their pay as would enable them to maintain that appearance before their fellow-citizens and the representatives of foreign countries when abroad which universal sentiment requires of all officers. They therefore pray that Congress will in its wisdom and justice provide for an increase of the pay of the naval officers of the United States. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a communication addressed to him from the Commissioner of Agriculture, in relation to the subject of cultivating the China grass; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James LeCaze, late of the firm of LeCaze & Mallett, praying for the payment of money advanced during the revolutionary war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 249) to establish a land office in the Territory of Idaho, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of the 16th ultimo to inquire whether the full Army Register, now in course of publication, has been compiled in accordance with the requirement of the joint resolution approved March 2, 1865, and what will be the cost of such publication, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) respecting the publication of the Volunteer Army Register. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 128) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, on the navigable waters of the Columbia river, in Oregon, have instructed me to report an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and I will state that the substitute is the House bill on the same subject, with some amendments.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred various petitions of persons engaged in mining and running coal from the Monongahela coal-fields to market on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, praying for such an amendment of the enrollment act as to exempt from its provisions all coal-boats, coal-barges, and coal-flats which are used exclusively for running coal to market, and are not used for any other purpose, have considered the subject, and have directed me to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and recommend that they be referred to the Committee on Finance; and I will say, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance will give his attention, that there is accompanying the papers a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending that they be exempted from the enrollment and be required to take out a license instead, and it was the opinion of the Committee on Commerce that it should be referred to the Committee on Finance that they might see whether they would issue a license, and if so, whether they would recommend or not that they be exempt from enrollment.

The report was agreed to.

DISCONTINUANCE OF LAND OFFICES.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 250) for the discontinuance in certain cases of land offices, and authorizing modifications in the limits of land districts, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to have the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Kansas considered and passed. I trust there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its first section provides that whenever the public land in a State shall have been so nearly sold out as to render unnecessary the continuance of the district office of register and receiver, the Secretary of the Interior may order the transfer to the General Land Office of the land archives belonging to such districts; and in regard to the disposal of any residue of public lands in such districts the Commissioner is to possess all the powers previously possessed by the register and receiver. The second section provides that whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be advantageous to the public interest to modify the limits of a land district, either by enlarging or diminishing the same, he may cause such modification to be made, giving timely public notice thereof.

Mr. GRIMES. I would inquire what is meant by that last section. Is it intended to confer the power on the Secretary of the Interior to create new land districts?

Mr. POMEROY. It is not. It allows him to change the boundaries, or to consolidate two districts into one; but it does not allow him to make new districts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does not that power to change the boundaries already exist?

Mr. POMEROY. It exists so far as regards the State of California, but is not a general law. That is done under a special act allowing the Secretary of the Interior to change the boundaries of land districts in California; but he has not the right to change the boundaries in any other State, or to put two land districts into one in any other State.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think he has that power. At least he has exercised it in our State, for he has consolidated two districts there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that I applied to the General Land Office for a change in the boundaries of a land district in the State of Oregon, where it was necessary that the boundaries should be changed, and after examination the Department decided that it had no such power, and suggested that a bill of this kind be passed, authorizing the Department to exercise the power. It is at the suggestion of the Department that this bill is introduced and proposed to be passed, so that they may possess the power.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to make another inquiry of the Senator from Kansas. In discontinuing all the land offices in a State where the lands are nearly exhausted, which I think is very proper and ought to have been done long ago in some of the States where there are still land offices, I submit whether provision ought not to be made for keeping the records in the State. When land offices have been consolidated, the books of the land office discontinued have gone to the consolidated office. There is occasion very often to refer to these records, and it will be exceedingly inconvenient in one of the new States, where all the land formerly belonged to the Government and all titles are derived from the Government, if when controversies arise the parties must come to Washington to trace the titles. It seems to me that provision ought to be made for depositing at the State capitals, with the States, the records of the land offices, or in some way for preserving them within the States. Unless that be done, they will exist nowhere except at Washington. I know it is the constant practice in my State, when actions arise involving the title to lands, to apply to the land office for certificates showing who entered the lands, when they were entered, and whether they were preempted, and so on, and by a statute of our State the certificate of the receiver of public moneys or register of public lands is made evidence, and I presume that is the law generally in the new States. Now, I submit if, instead of transferring the records to Washington, some provision ought not to be made to leave them in the States.

Mr. POMEROY. I will say, in reply to the Senator, that that subject has been for more than a month discussed in the Committee on Public Lands, and at two succeeding meetings the Commissioner of the General Land Office has been before the committee. The very point that the Senator from Illinois now makes was argued before the committee at considerable length. In examining the way the records are kept, both in the General Land Office here and in the various districts, we found that they did not have here duplicates of the certificates of entry. It was at first supposed that if they were brought here to the General Land Office it would be only multiplying papers of the same character; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office says that he now has to send to these various land offices himself to get copies whenever a contest arises in which he is asked to furnish them. It is very strenuously urged, by the General Land Office at least, that the whole of the documents in each case should be deposited here when we close out the land districts in a State. The committee have no feeling about it more than to make our system harmonious, and to accommodate the entry of these lands to the system that they have already adopted. It has been a long time before that committee, and we have been urged for a good while to report it. We hesitated somewhat, but finally concluded to report it as the Commissioner of the General Land Office desired it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was quite aware that the Senator from Kansas had no other object in view than the promotion of the public interests. The people of Kansas are just as much interested in this question as those of Illinois. We are all interested alike. Having been engaged somewhat in the practice of the law, I know that we have frequent occasion in those States to resort to the land offices for information, and I am sure it will subject the people to great inconvenience if the only information they can obtain in regard to land titles in their region is from Washington. It is very difficult to get that evidence from the Land Office here. During the present session I have been written to by gentlemen of the bar in my State for information in regard to tracts of land which they said they had written for and could not obtain, and they asked me to interfere and go to the Land Office and see if I could get for them the evidence of the entry of a tract of land or the grant of a tract of land, and when it took place, and to whom it was granted. These are facts that ought to be come-at-able conveniently by the people who are interested. I think the bill had better go over, so that we may have an opportunity to look at it a little more closely.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to its going over; but I submit to the Senator that in a large State like Illinois, where we have reduced all the offices to one, it will be as difficult for the people living at remote districts from Springfield to get the evidence from Springfield as to get it from Washington. They have got to write for it; and if they send to Washington they can get all the evidence in the case, while if they send to Springfield they can only get a part.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You will have to employ a great many new clerks here if they are all to be compelled to come here.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the bill going over.

Mr. GRIMES. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to the phraseology of this bill, from which, if I understand it, nobody can tell whether it applies to a State like Illinois, where there is only one district, or to a State like Iowa where there are several. It is very inartificially drawn, it seems to me, and ought to be redrafted.

Mr. POMEROY. It is drawn precisely to leave the discretion in the Secretary of the Interior to judge whether a district should be discontinued or not.

Mr. GRIMES. Any district?

Mr. POMEROY. Any district in any State. That is the meaning of it.

Mr. GRIMES. Then, as I understand it, if the Commissioner of the General Land Office chooses to discontinue one of the districts in the State of Iowa, all the archives in regard to that district are to be transferred here.

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir, that is not the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the way it reads.

Mr. POMEROY. Where two districts are consolidated into one in a State they remain in the State; but when the land offices are closed out in a State then the bill provides that the archives shall be sent to Washington.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very likely that is the intention of the Committee on Public Lands, but that is not what the bill will accomplish it it should be enacted into a law.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, while this bill is up, as it will be further considered at another time, that there is another difficulty connected with this subject, which is, that if these records come to the Land Office here, they will come under the operation of an existing law by which the Land Office is authorized to charge fifteen cents a folio for transcripts of records, which they are asked for, and which are so often needed, and they cannot be obtained without the payment of that sum. The committee should take that provision into consideration, because it is a grievous tax on the public which ought not to be permitted to remain, and it should not be extended by a bill of this kind to bring other records subject to it. Recently, in a case at the Land Office, where a decision was made against one of my constituents, and he was required to file his appeal within a given time, to get the evidence upon which he might make up his case, he was asked to pay fifteen cents a folio, when I was compelled to say that I would call for the evidence and papers in the case, by a resolution of the Senate, unless they were furnished; and then he got access to the papers. There is an existing law which, in my opinion, very much needs repeal or modification, subjecting the people connected with land questions to this enormous tax. It was enacted because of the many demands that were made upon the office, with restricted clerical force, for papers; and the Government finally, in its own behalf, inflicted this enormous tax. I make this suggestion now for the benefit of the committee, so that in the further consideration of this bill that great difficulty and exaction may be cured.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there is an existing rule—I know there was at one time—in the land department, which prevented the furnishing of copies of papers there except upon affidavits. I do not know whether there was a law on the subject or not; but I know that at one time the Commissioner of the General Land Office refused to furnish transcripts from the records unless certain affidavits were filed. If a party desirous of purchasing a tract of land wished to ascertain whether it could be safely purchased, it was clogged, before he could get the transcripts of the entry of the land or its grant by Government, with impediments which were very much in the way of the transfer of land. I do not know whether that rule exists now, but I am quite sure that it did some years ago.

Mr. POMEROY. It has been modified by the law to which the Senator from California has referred. Parties may now have transcripts by paying fifteen cents a folio for them. The difficulty which the Senator suggests was modified by the law to which the Senator from California has referred.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest that it needs further modification.

Mr. WILSON. I thought it was understood that this bill was to go over for further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no motion to that effect as yet.

Mr. WILSON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit the following report from a committee of conference, and ask for action upon it now:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 26) entitled "An act to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas," having met, after full and free conference they have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, and that it agree to the second amendment of the House with an amendment as follows: at the end of the amendment insert the words, "subject, however, to the power of Congress to alter and determine said rates;" and that the House agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER,

J. M. MORRILL,

JOHN CONNESS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,

CHARLES O'NEILL,

NELSON TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

SARAH E. PICKELL.

Mr. JOHNSON. Some time since I made a motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell. I move to take up that motion now with a view to refer the bill back to the Committee on Pensions. I do this at the request and with the concurrence of the chairman of that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate postponing the bill indefinitely. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now moved that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to take up Senate bill No. 99.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 99) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Albany, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of said State. To aid in the construction of a military wagon road from Albany, Oregon, by way of Cargon City and the most feasible pass in Cascade range of mountains, to the eastern boundary of the State, the bill proposes to grant alternate sections of public lands, designated by odd numbers, for three sections in width on each side of said road. The lands granted are to be exclusively applied to the construction of the road, and to be disposed of only as the work progresses; and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by act of Congress or other competent authority are reserved from the operation of the act, except so far as it may be necessary to locate the route of the road through the same, in which case the right of way is granted.

Mr. CONNESS. I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to one of the provisions of this bill, which is the grant of the right of way through any reservation for military or other purposes, without subjecting that grant to the approval of anybody whatever hereafter. It would authorize the company to locate the road so as to destroy a reservation for military or other uses; they might run through the heart of it. I apprehend that is not contemplated, and yet it may be done under this provision as it stands. I suggest that it be amended so as to subject the grant of the right of way through public reservations to the approval of the Department to which the reservation may belong, as the Interior or War Department.

Mr. NESMITH. I suggest to the Senate that the simple grant of right of way cannot very well interfere with any reservation. It does not give any of the land of the reservation for any purpose, but simply the right of way.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that, but the right of way might destroy a military reservation.

Mr. NESMITH. I do not see how that could result simply from a road passing through it.

Mr. CONNESS. It might run through a military post.

Mr. POMEROY. It has been usual to put in that the right of way is granted subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and then he refers it to the proper Department.

Mr. NESMITH. I have no objection to a provision of that sort.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to add to the first section of the bill "subject to the approval of the President of the United States," and then he will refer it to whatever Department it comes under. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. NESMITH. There is a typographical error in the fifth line of the first section. It is here printed "Cargon City;" it should be "Canyon City."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to offer a resolution, and unless it is objected to, I should like to have action upon it now:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the standing committees of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire and report what further provisions, if any, should be made for the accommodation of the State Department.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The resolution involves very considerably more than appears upon its face; but in drawing it I thought it best to word it as I have done. It is known, I suppose, by everybody, that the north wing of the Treasury extension is in process of being erected. In order to complete it, it will be necessary to take down the building which is at present occupied by the State Department. There is no place provided to which the State Department can go; and I do not know but that it must follow that the work on the Treasury building must be suspended for the want of power to accommodate the State Department. There is no fire-proof building where it would be safe to lodge the very important documents which are there.

It has been suggested to me that there may be great difficulties in carrying out the present plan; but it is very advisable, and very necessary, in fact, that the Treasury building should be completed. It has occurred to me—and I will state this as a suggestion—that we shall be very soon obliged to erect a new Presidential Mansion somewhere; we ought to have a different place from that to be occupied by the President, and a place surrounded by grounds of proper extent. How soon this can be done I do not know, nor do I know what facilities may exist for doing it. In that case, the present Mansion might very well, perhaps, be occupied by the State Department. I merely suggest this. But it is very evident to me that the whole Treasury building will be needed for the accommodation of the Treasury Department itself. For instance, the Internal Revenue Bureau is now in a building on the other side of the street, which is not a fire-proof building, and a fire in that building and a loss of all the papers there would involve infinite confusion and difficulty.

The whole subject is one that has really got to a point that presses upon the consideration of Congress to make the proper provision for the Departments and for the safety of the important papers in the different Departments, and it is high time, in my judgment, that the whole matter should be deliberately considered by Congress. I have thought, therefore, that the better way was simply to call the attention of the Committees of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds to the subject with regard to the State Department, which when they come to investigate they will find involves the consideration of the whole subject, which cannot be, in my judgment, any longer delayed. I therefore hope that the resolution will be adopted in order that the matter may be considered.

Mr. SUMNER. I am glad that the Senator from Maine has called attention to this subject. It has occupied something of my thoughts during this whole session. No one can visit the State Department without seeing that the building is, if I may so express myself, on its last legs; that it will not continue long. It is old itself, but it must give way, as the Senator suggests, to the Treasury building; and all that space, I presume, will be needed for the purposes of the Treasury building. The question, then, is where we shall place the State Department. I have heard it suggested that it should be transferred to the present Mansion of the President; but there is one remark to make upon that, that Mansion is not fire-proof.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It can be made so, I understand.

Mr. SUMNER. I have heard that suggested, and still again I have heard it doubted. I merely throw that out as something which of course the committee or the authorities who have it in charge must most carefully consider, for we should all start with the idea that the State Department must be placed in a fire-proof building. There are all the archives of the Government from the beginning except some few, and they are in reasonably good preservation. There are also the original treaties, and with regard to these I have often thought myself, and have sometimes thought of introducing a joint resolution to that effect, that it would be advisable to have them transferred to the museum at the Patent Office. They are essentially curiosities. As they are now published in the Statutes-at-Large, they are not of essential importance as records, but they are very curious, for instance, for a visitor or a traveler who comes to Washington. They ought, however, all will see, to be in some place that is fire-proof. I therefore assume that the building which we shall have must be fire-proof, and the practical question will be, whether the President's Mansion could be put in such condition. I do not know whether it could or not; but if it could, it certainly would be very favorable for the purposes of the State Department, central, accessible; but as the Senator from Maine says, that of course would entail the building of a Mansion for the President himself. I think all have foreseen that we must do that very soon, and I am very glad that attention is called to the question.

The resolution was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD—SIOUX CITY BRANCH.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill No. 109, relating to the Sioux City branch of the Pacific railroad.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 109) to rescind the order of the President designating the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct the branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. GRIMES.

Mr. SUMNER. I see that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] who was to speak on this question when it was last up is not now in his seat. I remember perfectly well he was about to speak because we had a little conference on the subject. He is not now in his seat.

Mr. HOWARD. I mentioned to him yesterday that I should call it up at the first opportunity.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps he did not expect it before next week.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know how that may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he let the bill lie over until my colleague shall be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to postpone the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose the Senator will not press it in my colleague's absence.

Mr. HOWARD. Not if he wants to speak.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood he did. I have not had any conference with him since the bill was under consideration before; but I understand the Senator from Massachusetts has had.

Mr. SUMNER. I have had; and he told me he should speak.

Mr. HOWARD. Let it lie over.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN ERICSSON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 274.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of John Ericsson was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Ericsson the sum of $18,930, in full for his services in planning the United States war steamer Princeton, and planning and superintending the construction of the machinery of that steamer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from California desires some explanation. I will make it very briefly. This is the compensation awarded by the Court of Claims to John Ericsson for his services in planning the steamer Princeton. The bill is accompanied by a lengthy report from the Court of Claims. The committee have examined the case and have no doubt of the justice of the claim.

Mr. CONNESS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Ericsson has been too busy in building a navy for us to press it himself here.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday rejected the resolution granting to Mrs. Walling the use of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

JOSEPH NOCK.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 71, a small resolution referring some papers to the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 71) referring the petition and papers in the case of Joseph Nock to the Court of Claims was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its provisions the claim of Joseph Nock for damages occasioned by the annulment of his contract for furnishing locks and keys for the use of the United States mail, and also for the use of Nock's patent in the manufacture of mail locks subsequent to such annulment, will be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision, in accordance with the principles of equity and justice; but the court is not to render judgment for a greater sum than is contained in the report of Solicitor Comstock to the Senate, dated December 22, 1852.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WEST VIRGINIA MILITARY CLAIMS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 230.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 230) to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the President to appoint a commissioner to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of West Virginia in enrolling, supplying, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such State forces as have been called into service in that State since the 20th day of June, 1861, to act in concert with the United States forces in the suppression of rebellion against the United States. The commissioner is to examine all the expenditures made by the State for the purposes named, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, supplying, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor, at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which West Virginia may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander, or which may have been employed in suppressing rebellion in said State. No allowance is to be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and cooperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders. From the aggregate amount found to be due, the commissioner is to deduct the amount of direct tax due by the State to the United States under the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861.

In the adjustment of accounts the commissioner is not to allow for any expenditure or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States in similar cases. If from his report it shall appear that any sum remains due to the State, the Secretary of the Treasury is to draw his warrant for the same, payable to the Governor of the State, and deliver it to him. The commissioner before proceeding to the discharge of his duties is to be sworn that he will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of West Virginia, and that he will to the best of his ability make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof, as required by this act. He is to receive such compensation for his services as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. The sum of $368,548 37 is appropriated to carry the act into effect.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask that the report of the Military Committee in this case be read.

The Secretary read the following report, which was submitted by Mr. NESMITH on the 27th of March:

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, adopted February 17, 1866, "to secure an appropriation by Congress for the payment of certain military claims created in that State during the war," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That from an examination of official documents and vouchers, together with the statement of Governor Arthur I. Boreman and Adjutant General Peirpoint, it appears that the State of West Virginia did incur liabilities in defending that State against the rebels and guerrillas during the rebellion, as follows:

1. For moneys paid to independent companies, the sum of.....	$213,988 42
2. For moneys appropriated for payment of militia.....	142,645 12
3. For appropriations for supplying militia while in service.....	3,271 88
4. For subsisting and equipping volunteer recruits mustered into service of the United States.....	1,592 10
5. For money paid to Upshur county militia while prisoners.....	6,950 85
Total.....	$368,548 37

The necessity for the foregoing expenditures may be briefly stated:

The first class above mentioned were independent companies, numbering from twenty-five to seventy-five men, with one commissioned officer, organized in the border counties of the State, with instructions and orders to cooperate as far as practicable with the United States forces, and to keep down and suppress lawless bands of guerrillas or partisan rangers, then continually infesting such counties, under authority of the so-called Confederate government, for purposes of plunder and conscription. The services rendered by these companies were of great value and importance to the United States troops stationed near the border, acting, as they did, as scouts and guides through the mountains, and in furnishing information of the operations and movements of the enemy in their front. Being citizens and residents of the country in which they were required to operate, they were much more efficient for the purposes mentioned than the United States troops could have been. During the existence of these organizations many favorable notices of their services were received from military commanders within the department. The duty performed by them was of the most arduous and dangerous character, and they were only paid for the time actually on duty.

The second class mentioned is for services rendered by the militia of the State when called into actual service. The principal portion is for services rendered by six companies in the southwestern portion of the State, organized by authority of Governor Peirpoint, under the restored government of Virginia, in 1862. These companies were in the service continuously for nearly nine months, supplied with arms and ammunition, but furnishing their own clothing and subsistence. They were for the greater part of the time under the command and subject to the orders of Brigadier General Julius White, then commanding the district of east Kentucky, and other officers in the United States service in that district. Of these companies General White makes the following indorsement upon their muster and pay-rolls: "I had frequent and valuable services from these companies, and believe the time charged upon these rolls has been fairly and honestly estimated, and ought to be paid." This indorsement is also concurred in by Hon. Laban T. Moore and by Colonel John L. Zeigler, late of the fifth Virginia infantry volunteers. The remaining portion of this class is for services rendered by the militia for shorter periods, and were called out usually at the suggestion of the department and district commanders to act in concert with the United States troops in maintaining peace against guerrillas and in repelling hostile invasion.

Of the necessity for the service of the independent companies and militia mentioned it may be said to have been absolute. West Virginia was a border State, and her territory a matter of continual controversy from the commencement to the end of the rebellion; and while it was no doubt the intention of the General Government to furnish protection to the loyal people, yet from the nature of the warfare which existed there, the United States troops stationed within the State were inadequate for their protection, and without the assistance rendered by the militia of the State a large portion of the territory must have been abandoned, thus transferring the border from the mountains of West Virginia to the Ohio river or beyond it.

Of the other classes of claims it is, perhaps, unnecessary to speak. Suffice it to say, the subsistence and supplies charged for were furnished by the citizens of the State when the militia were called into service, and when they could not be supplied by the State or the United States Government.

The company of militia were organizing and drilling, when it was attacked by a superior force of the enemy, and sixty-eight of the company were captured and carried to southern prisons, forty-five of whom died while in prison. The surviving members of the company and the families of those who died in prison were paid thirteen dollars per month only from the date of capture to the date of death or release from prison.

The committee reporting the accompanying bill recommend its passage.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. It is not necessary to add more than a few words to the report of the committee. The bill in form is the same as the bill that passed the Senate for the relief of the State of Missouri, while the amount of the claim is much less. The whole amount that can be paid to West Virginia under the bill is only $368,000. The facts set forth in the report sufficiently show that this expense was incurred in repelling the invasion of the State, and in carrying on the war on the part, as it were, of the United States. Those troops were at all times under the command of United States officers, subject to be called on by them, and were frequently called out by them. I have in my hand letters and dispatches from major generals, brigadier generals, and colonels, United States officers, calling the troops into requisition. The report sets forth an indorsement made on the pay-rolls by General White in reference to the efficiency of the service of these troops, and expressing his opinion that the time charged for is not excessive. The principal charge is for the services of certain independent companies which were raised with the approbation of the President and the War Department, and were armed and equipped by the War Department, and subsisted by the Department, but who otherwise were at the expense of the State. No monthly pay was ever made to them by the General Government; and I have among the papers an order from the Secretary of War directing their disbandment at the close of the war, which shows that they were recognized as troops on the part of the United States.

The service in West Virginia, as is known to most Senators, was very peculiar. The whole State is made up of spurs of the Alleghanies, and consequently is a succession of high ridges, perhaps from one end of the State to the other. The people of that country, accustomed to these mountain paths, find their way in them at any time; but the service that was necessary there to protect the borders from invasion was a very unwilling service on the part of other troops who were called on to perform it. The fact is they were in great danger of their lives. They were in danger of being lost in the mountain paths, and by the peculiar knowledge of those to whom they were opposed in such a country they were in more danger than men would be under ordinary circumstances. These independent companies, therefore, were raised for this service. They took charge mainly of the frontier. They kept the State from being invaded and the property of everybody plundered and carried off, and they were also, as is fully stated in the papers, of immense service to the regular United States troops, in acting as scouts and furnishing them information.

It is proper to state, also, that the Government were hardly, at any time during the war, able to furnish us sufficient troops for our protection, and that these troops were raised for that purpose. It is within my personal knowledge that owing to some exigency arising in the military service elsewhere the troops were withdrawn from our whole frontier; even the troops guarding the railroad were withdrawn, and their places supplied by militia.

But, sir, these papers come before Congress in such a way that I think I need not enlarge much on the subject. The Legislature of West Virginia appointed a commission of respectable and highly intelligent gentlemen to investigate all these claims; and while the State has paid in excess of the sum named in the bill some sixty or seventy thousand dollars, yet, not deeming those accounts as formal as they should be, they have not sent them here for payment.

I may state, also, that this is the only claim that West Virginia has against the Government. While there are now pending in the two Houses claims from other States, amounting in some cases to millions of dollars, for organizing and putting in motion their troops, West Virginia has no such claim. It is known that she furnished to the volunteers of the Army, independent of these troops whose payment is now asked for, thirty-three thousand men, equal, when reduced to three years' men, to twenty-seven thousand, while a great portion, one third, perhaps, of her population were inimical to the Government. She has had these extra claims, if they may be so considered, thoroughly examined. The papers are all in regular order. They have been made out on United States blanks, and I apprehend that the commissioner who is to be appointed under this bill will have no difficulty in adjusting the claims satisfactorily.

The Senate will remember that this is not a final appropriation for this matter. These claims are all to come before a commissioner appointed, I believe, by the War Department, who will examine them thoroughly. The whole amount is but $368,000, if we get it all; and as we have within a few days passed a bill in favor of Missouri, and another in favor of Pennsylvania, and another in favor of Kansas, I trust the Senate will be disposed to look with favor on this application of West Virginia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may be mistaken, but I thought from the reading that the appropriation in the bill was something over six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Three hundred and sixty-eight thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the total appropriation?

Mr. NESMITH. Three hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and forty-eight dollars and thirty-seven cents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood it to be read $600,000. I will inquire, for I did not hear the details of the bill read, whether it is guarded with regard to the rates of payment of these troops, so as to bring it within military rules and the rules of the Department.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The sum that has been paid to these companies is but thirteen dollars a month. That is to pay them for their time. Then there is a small charge, not amounting to $5,000, for subsistence furnished by the State to these troops. Then there is a charge for a company which, while drilling for the first time, I believe, were surprised and carried off—sixty-eight in number, of whom forty-five perished in the prisons of the South. The State paid those men from the time of their capture until their death or release from captivity at the same rate, —thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator did not understand me. I inquired if there was any provision by which the rates would be brought within the principles established by the War Department.

Mr. NESMITH. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, I will state that the fourth section of the bill provides—

That in the adjustment of accounts under this act, the commissioner shall not allow for any expenditure or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States in similar cases.

That fixes the amount in relation to that. Then the third section provides:

That in making up said account, for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, the commissioner shall state separately the amounts expended, respectively, for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, transporting, and paying said troops, and from the aggregate amount he shall deduct the amount of direct tax due by the said State to the United States, under the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861.

This claim was referred to me by the Committee on Military Affairs for investigation, and I took very great pains to examine into all the details in connection with it. I examined the vouchers and the statements of the officers of West Virginia. The vouchers were very much in detail. I had not an opportunity of examining them all, but they were made out on blank forms furnished by the War Department; and I must say that I have never examined a set of papers which appeared to be more carefully made out and more perfect in all their details.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am entirely satisfied. The object of my inquiry was simply to find out whether the case was brought within the ordinary rules of the service.

Mr. NESMITH. It was thoroughly examined in all those respects. I will state that the item of $6,950 85 was the only point that I discovered in all the investigation about which there could be any possible doubt, and I think that that is a matter which will appeal to the humanity of every member of this body. Six thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars and eighty-five cents was appropriated and paid by the Legislature of West Virginia to the families of a company of militia who were captured by the enemy and confined in southern prisons. The report says:

"The company of militia were organizing and drilling, when it was attacked by a superior force of the enemy and sixty-eight of the company were captured and carried to southern prisons, forty-five of whom died while in prison. The surviving members of the company, and the families of those who died in prison, were paid thirteen dollars per month only from the date of capture to the date of death or release from prison."

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe this is an exact copy of the bill as originally prepared by me in the Missouri case, with the exception of the number of commissioners. It was originally prepared with three, but I preferred to have but one. The House of Representatives, however, when that bill passed inserted three commissioners, and also added another amendment, of which I do not recollect the precise language, but I know they required the report to be submitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury. Inasmuch as the bill would probably be amended in the House so as to make it correspond with the Missouri bill, and inasmuch as the Missouri bill passed in that way, and it will be nothing more than just to submit these claims to the same scrutiny, I will offer an amendment to insert after line five of section five these words:

Who shall cause the same to be examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and said officers shall audit the accounts as in ordinary cases.

So that the section will read:

That so soon as said commissioner shall have made up said account and ascertained the balance, as herein directed, he shall make written report thereof, showing the different items of expenditure, as hereinbefore stated, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and said officers shall audit the accounts as in ordinary cases, and if from said report it shall appear that any sum remains due to the said State, he shall draw his warrant for the same, payable to the Governor of said State and deliver it to him.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I accept the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest that the language should be, "in ordinary cases as if the same troops had been mustered into the service of the United States."

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no necessity for that. The Senator will see in the second section that it is sufficiently guarded in that point. There can be no allowance under this bill for troops that were not called out by the United States commanders, or did not perform service under them. If the Governor called out troops they are not to be paid. I think the bill is correct and ought to be passed. I think that where United States commanders called out the militia of any State and forced them to do service, and then required the State to pay those troops, the General Government ought to pay the State. It is nothing but just to West Virginia; and with the amendment I have suggested, I think the bill ought to pass. The words "said report" in the sixth line of the fifth section should be changed to "their reports;" so as to read, "and if from their reports it shall appear;" and then the bill will be correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to amend the bill by inserting at the end of line five of section five, the words, "who shall cause the same to be examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and said officers shall audit the accounts as in ordinary cases;" and in line six by striking out the words "said report" and inserting "their reports."

Mr. POMEROY. The bill in relation to Kansas, I believe, had the same provision in it; I think it ought to be in at any rate. I do not know but that all the bills on this subject have had the same provision.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The language of the Kansas bill was that they were to be paid "as if they had been mustered into the service of the United States." The only question which arose in my mind was whether the accounting officers of the Treasury, who are very technical as to the law, would raise any question about their not having been actually mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. POMEROY. I think this amendment embodies substantially the same thing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following order, and ask for its present consideration:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, which passed the Senate with amendments, and was sent to the House of Representatives for its concurrence in the said amendments.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the order.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the object of it?

Mr. POLAND. To reconsider the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Such an order, I believe, is always agreed to, as a matter of course, so as to allow a Senator to exercise his privilege of moving a reconsideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Might we not meet the question now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to meet it to-day if the bill comes back at once.

Mr. SUMNER. Might we not meet it now on this motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not; that is unusual. If the Senator should move a reconsideration, I should like to have it disposed of to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I only make the suggestion with a view to the economy of time, that we should not call the bill back needlessly. If on this proposition the Senator from Vermont will state the grounds on which he desires a reconsideration, we might then act on his proposition, and practically pass upon the question of reconsideration.

Mr. MORRILL. But in the mean time they might act upon the bill in the House of Representatives.

Mr. POLAND. I supposed that this motion was always agreed to as a matter of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Vermont might lose the privilege which our rules give him of moving to reconsider unless we get the bill back speedily. The House may pass upon it, and there would be an end of it.

Mr. POLAND. I am not very familiar with the course of business in the Senate, but I understood that a resolution of this sort was always passed as a matter of course prior to a reconsideration.

The order was adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to reconsider, if entered at all, must be entered to-day under the rules.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Vermont did not state the grounds of his motion to reconsider, or does he merely give notice of such a motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) No motion to reconsider can be entered until the bill is returned from the House: and debate is out of order.

Mr. POLAND. I supposed it was not proper to move to reconsider until the bill was returned. I will then state the grounds on which I shall make the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 155) concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 179) amendatory of the organic act of Washington Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 202) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana," approved May 26, 1864; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to facilitate communication with certain Territories.

BOUNDARIES OF NEVADA.

Mr. NYE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 155) concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada, which has just been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, with a view of concurring in that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear what it is about.

Mr. NYE. It is a simple amendment added by the House to our boundary bill, reserving the rights of those who have located mines in the territory about to be incorporated into Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to add at the end of the bill the following:

And provided further, That all possessory rights acquired by citizens of the United States to mining claims, discovered, located, and originally recorded in compliance with the rules and regulations adopted by miners in the Pah Rangat or other mining districts in the Territory incorporated by the provisions of this act into the State of Nevada, shall remain as valid subsisting mining claims: but nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting a title in fee to any mineral lands held by possessory titles in the mining States and Territories.

Mr. WADE. I hope that amendment will be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 11.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I shall take the liberty of detaining the Senate a few minutes in the consideration of this bill, and but a few, for I see about me a disposition to come to a final vote upon it as soon as practicable. The bill provides—

That every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination: Provided, That this act shall not affect any stipulation between the Government of the United States and any railroad company for transportation or fares without compensation, nor impair or change the conditions imposed by the terms of any act granting lands to any such company to aid in the construction of its road.

I thought, Mr. President, when I first read this bill, that its provisions were so plain and so evidently within the scope of the constitutional powers of Congress that it would be difficult for any gentleman, however ingenious, to raise a doubt as to its constitutionality; but like many other bills which we have had under consideration during the present Congress, as well as in former Congresses, this has encountered a very earnest and obstinate resistance, founded upon the idea that it is prohibited by the Constitution; and the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] in very deprecatory tones, and almost in accents of despair at the prospect of its passing the Senate, says to us that if we are thus to amend or endeavor to amend from time to time the Constitution of the United States, that if one Congress after another may encroach upon its provisions, we may as well have no Constitution. Undoubtedly, sir, the convictions of that honorable Senator of the unconstitutionality of this measure are very deep and strong. I could wish for the sake of the bill and the country that we could have his full and free concurrence, for I know, and so does the country, that his opinion upon so grave a question is entitled to and receives very great respect. Still, sir, after listening with much attention to his eloquent and ingenious argument against the bill, I have failed to be convinced by it of the unconstitutionality of the measure. On the other hand, I hold it to be strictly within the constitutional power of Congress, and to be a very expedient and necessary act for us to pass at this time; and I regret that so great a length of time has passed without such a Federal statute as this for the protection of the people of the different States of the Union in their commercial transactions.

The honorable Senator from Maryland informs us that this is an attempt to alter, to modify, and even to enlarge a State charter, and he accuses us of an attempt to override the just and legitimate powers of the States in reference to the creation of corporations for commercial purposes. In order that I may do him no injustice in this respect, I will take the liberty of reading from the Globe a single passage which states more clearly than I am able to do his first ground of objection. He says:

"In the first place, what the bill does is to enlarge a charter granted by a State; it is amendatory to a State charter. It assumes, as vested in Congress, therefore, the power to take into its own hands the charters granted by the several States, and to modify them just as they think proper, not only by extending the authority which the charter may grant, but if, in the judgment of Congress, at any time hereafter, or now, any of the restrictions in those charters are calculated to interfere with commerce between the States, or to impede the transportation of the mails, they have the authority to repeal, practically, any of the limitations in the charter or any of the powers conferred upon the company by the charter."

Now, sir, with great deference to that opinion, I insist that this bill does not assume to alter or amend in any legal respect any charter granted by a State.

The honorable Senator observed further—and he will pardon me for saying that I think in rather unguarded terms—that in enacting a charter of incorporation, it is the right of every State to annex to that charter such terms and conditions as the State pleases to annex; and therefore it follows, according to him, that if, for instance, the State of New Jersey shall enact a charter which prohibits the carrying on of "commerce among the States" by any person or by corporation within the limits of that State, inasmuch as this is a condition annexed to the charter, Congress cannot interfere to relieve the people of the other States who are trading and trafficking through New Jersey from the impediment thus created.

This appears to be the essence of his argument: that a State has a right to annex any condition which it may see fit to its charters of incorporation, and that it is out of the power of Congress, by any act of theirs, to relieve the community from such condition, however severe and unjust it may be in its effects upon the citizens of other States. On that point I take issue with the honorable Senator from Maryland. Sir, a charter of incorporation for commercial purposes, granted by the Legislature of a State to private persons, has ever been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a contract—a contract inviolable on the part of the State. It is, then, like any other contract or compact between individuals; the State being the party of the first part, and the corporators, after having accepted the charter, the parties of the second part. In the present case, the question is whether a State, by its legislation, either in the form of incorporating private companies or otherwise, can take into its hands and control a power which does not belong to the State, but which belongs exclusively to Congress under the Constitution.

I think the honorable Senator will concede that if the matter of commerce, either foreign or among the States, be one which belongs not to the States at all but exclusively to Congress under the Constitution; if a State charter assumes in any way whatever to control, to burden, to hinder, or to prevent commerce among the States or commerce with a foreign country; if it annexes such a condition as this which I have described to its charter of incorporation, that condition is void in law, because the State has no authority whatever to annex such a condition to its charter. That portion of the charter, therefore, which assumes to control commerce among the States or commerce with a foreign country is void in law for the want of authority on the part of the State to exercise it. It is simply an attempt to exercise a power and authority on the part of the State Legislature ultra vires—not within the scope of its power, but belonging exclusively to the Congress of the United States.

What, then, is the character of commerce as defined by the Constitution, whether known as foreign commerce or commerce among the States, for in law there is no difference whatever? I assert that it has been held over and over again by the highest judicial authorities of the land that the power over commerce of either kind pertains exclusively to Congress, and does not belong at all to the States.

The Senate will pardon me for refreshing their recollection by certain references to adjudged cases. As the Senator from Maryland has indulged rather freely in such references he certainly will pardon me for imitating his example. I call his attention to certain passages which I will now read from what are known as the "passenger cases," decided by the Supreme Court of the United in 1848. I read from the opinion given by Judge McLean in those cases in which he groups together previous opinions. On page 125 of 17 Curtis's Condensed Reports, Judge McLean quotes the language of Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, where he says:

"The power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions," &c.

Again, he quotes from the same opinion of Marshall:

"Where, then, each government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other; but when a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, it is exercising the very power that is granted to Congress, and is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do."

Again, says Judge McLean:

"And Mr. Justice Johnson, who gave a separate opinion in the same case, observes: 'The power to regulate commerce here meant to be granted, was the power to regulate commerce which previously existed in the States.' And again: 'The power to regulate commerce is necessarily exclusive.'"

"In Brown vs. The State of Maryland, 12 Wheat., 446, the court say: 'It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant of commercial power should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States.' This question, they remark, 'was considered in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which it was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations.' And Mr. Justice Baldwin, in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 511, says: 'That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is exclusive of any interference by the States, has been, in my opinion, conclusively settled by the solemn opinions of this court, in the two cases above cited. And he observes: 'If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the Constitution, I know of none which are not yet open to doubt.'"

"Mr. Justice Story, in the case of New York vs. Miln, 11 Pet., 158, in speaking of the doctrine of concurrent power in the States to regulate commerce, says, that 'in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, it was deliberately examined and deemed inadmissible by the court. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, with his accustomed accuracy and fullness of illustration, reviewed at that time the whole ground of the controversy; and from that time to the present the question has been considered, so far as I know, at rest. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, has been deemed exclusive from the nature and objects of the power, and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise.'"

* At page 147 of the same volume will be found this passage from the opinion of Mr. Justice Wayne, in the passenger cases:

"Keeping, then, in mind what commerce is, and how far a nation may legally limit her own commercial transactions with another State, we cannot be at a loss to determine, from the subject-matter of the clause in the Constitution, that the meaning of the terms used in it is to exclude the States from regulating commerce in any way, except their own internal trade, and to confide its legislative regulation completely and entirely to Congress. When I say completely and entirely to Congress, I mean all that can be included in the term 'commerce among the several States,' subject, of course, to the right of the States to pass inspection laws in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, to the prohibition of any duty upon exports, either from one State to another State, or to foreign countries, and to that commercial uniformity which the Constitution enjoins respecting all that relates to the introduction of merchandise into the United States, and those who may bring it for sale, whether they are citizens or foreigners, and all that concerns navigation, whether vessels are employed in the transportation of passengers or freight, or both; including also, all the regulations which the necessities and safety of navigation may require."

I read, also, upon the subject of the exclusive character of the commercial power in the Constitution, from the second volume of Story's Commentaries, sections 1062 and 1063:

"In short, in a practical view, it is impossible to separate the regulation of foreign commerce and domestic commerce among the States from each other. The same public policy applies to each; and not a reason can be assigned for confiding the power over the one which does not conduce to establish the propriety of conceding the power over the other. The next inquiry is whether this power to regulate commerce is exclusive of the same power in the States or is concurrent with it."

Upon this subject I desire the attention of Senators. It is sometimes said that there is a commercial power in the States connected either with foreign commerce or with commerce among the States, which is to be regarded as concurrent with the power of the General Government over the same subject-matter. I wish to make myself understood on this point. The principle is, that the commercial power as granted in the Constitution is not even concurrent in any form or degree with the power of the States, but that it is absolutely exclusive in all cases.

Mr. MORRILL. While the Senator is upon that point, I will ask him if he recognizes the principle in the Delaware case, the case of Wilson vs. The Blackbird Creek Company, where the court settled that the power might be exercised by the States if jurisdiction had not been taken by the United States, and that to that extent it was concurrent.

Mr. HOWARD. It is some time since I examined the Blackbird creek case to which the Senator from Maine alludes; but I think upon a careful perusal and consideration of that case he will find that no such conclusion can be drawn from the rulings of the court. If the Senator will have the goodness to look at the comments upon the rulings in the Blackbird creek case, to be found in the passenger cases, he will discover that the Supreme Court in the latter cases did not so construe them. There were some peculiar circumstances connected with the Blackbird creek case which have no real relation to the question now under consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. As the Senator says the facts are not fresh in his recollection, he will allow me to state that that was a case of navigable waters open to the sea in the State of Delaware. The State of Delaware, through her Legislature, had exercised the right of damming that creek, and that raised the question of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that although it was navigable water and open to the sea, and undoubtedly on general principles would be within the jurisdiction of the United States, still as the United States had not exercised authority over it, the State might not improperly exercise such authority, and her authority would be good and valid until the United States did intervene. I think I recollect distinctly the case.

Mr. HOWARD. But I think the Senator will find that in the same decision the court recognized the principle that the State of Delaware could not obstruct the navigation of that creek by any structure that she might make. I do not remember particularly about that, but I think the Senator will discover that his Blackbird creek case has very little relation to the question now before us.

In commenting upon the commercial power, Judge Story remarks in his Commentaries, section 1063:

"The next inquiry is, whether this power to regulate commerce is exclusive of the same power in the States or is concurrent with it. It has been settled upon the most solemn deliberation that the power is exclusive in the Government of the United States. The reasoning upon which this doctrine is founded is to the following effect: the power to regulate commerce is general and unlimited in its terms. The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of a power to regulate necessarily excludes the action of all others, who would perform the same operation on the same thing. Regulation is designed to indicate the entire result applying to those parts which remain as they were, as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to have unbounded as that on which it has operated."

Now, sir, if such be the character of the commercial power as conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, if it be in reality an exclusive power, as it has been decided to be by the Supreme Court in numerous instances, it was given to Congress for some beneficial purpose, and given with the intent that Congress, on all proper occasions, should exercise it. If it be given thus exclusively, and if the whole of it has been given, as Mr. Justice Story argues that it has been, I ask the honorable Senator from Maryland, and the honorable Senator from Maine, who takes the same ground in opposition to this bill, upon what principle is it that a State can legislate at all upon the subject of foreign commerce or commerce among the States. Where is the basis of any such legislation? The courts say the State is divested completely of its power over the subject-matter known as commerce, in all its parts, and that commerce is a unit, and pertains as such exclusively to Congress.

Can a State, then, insert, as one of the conditions of its charter, that the company or the private person to whom the charter relates, or to whom the license may be given, shall not engage in the business of commerce among the various States? Can a charter be predicated upon such a condition? The condition itself is not one which it is competent for the State Legislature to impose. It rests upon an assumption of authority which has been taken away—conceded away to the Congress by the will of the American people.

I need not say to the honorable Senator from Maryland that a condition inserted in any contract which in itself is unlawful, or which it is incompetent for the parties to it to agree to, is of itself void and inoperative, and if it affects the whole instrument, if no part of the instrument can be carried out according to the intention of the parties without giving effect to this particular clause, the whole instrument falls to the ground; but if portions of the instrument can be maintained, and the infected portion, which is void as against law or for want of authority, can be separated from the rest, then courts of law uphold the agreement between the parties pro tanto.

Now, I insist, sir, that a State charter cannot impose conditions upon a company that shall prevent, burden, or obstruct commerce, because the power to regulate commerce is granted exclusively to Congress, and therefore such a condition is void. Sir, suppose a State should assume to incorporate a company, and one of the conditions of the charter should be that neither the company nor any stockholder of the company should be engaged in foreign commerce; that the company should not be engaged in commerce with Canada or with any portion of the British possessions, will the honorable Senator from Maryland contend that such a condition would be valid; that any force could be given to it, or that it would receive any attention at the hands of a court of justice?

I think he will not, because it is too obvious that in such a case the Legislature has passed the boundaries of its power, and the condition it has assumed to annex is a void condition.

What is the New Jersey case, so called? I shall spend little time upon it; I will merely allude to it. I understand that the charter of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, connecting the city of New York with the city of Philadelphia, those two points being the termini of the road, contains in it a clause to this effect:

"That it shall not be lawful at any time during the said railroad charter to construct any other railroads in this State without the consent of the said companies."

That means the companies constituting the whole line—

"which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative."

That charter also contains, as one of its precious provisions, this most singular imposition upon the citizens of other States, that the company shall pay into the treasury of the State of New Jersey ten cents per capita for every passenger who shall pass over the line between New York and Philadelphia. If I misstate this provision of the charter I desire to be corrected.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I will ask the honorable Senator to give a little further attention to that particular provision, and he will find that it is accompanied with a statement that it is in lieu of all taxation; they are to pay that in lieu of taxes; that is the consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. That does not change the principle at all. Whatever may be the consideration passing to the State or to the company for this provision in the charter, the charter itself imposes upon the company in form, but really and in effect upon the passenger who travels, the sum of ten cents as a State tax, to be paid into the treasury of the State of New Jersey. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet;" it is a tax in intention, in essence, and in practice.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan, to understand this matter aright. As I understand what the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Michigan say, in point of substance, the entire tax due from the company to the State is levied upon the passengers. The tax on the passengers, as I understand the Senator from Maine to say, is in lieu of all State taxes, so that the entire tax levied by the State upon the company is really levied upon passengers traveling from one State to another.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Michigan, but if he will permit me, on that point, I desire to say that it is a great deal broader than the Senator supposes. I understand, treating this charter now in the nature of a contract between the State and the company, to encourage the company to enter upon this work, the State say, we grant you this exclusive right to carry these passengers, and if you perform the conditions on your part you shall be exempt from all taxation, city, county, and town; and in lieu of it you shall pay a revenue of ten cents upon each passenger you carry through the State. There are other reservations as to tonnage; but as to the item referred to, it is ten cents, and it is in lieu of taxation.

Mr. HOWARD. There is a small specific tax upon the through freight according to the same charter—the through freight from New York to Philadelphia and vice versa; but I do not care whether this tax upon passengers and freight through New Jersey be small or great, it makes no difference as to the principle. The question of principle is, whether it is a constitutional power of New Jersey to make such a discrimination among the passengers who travel and the freight which passes over its road as is here made.

Mr. MORRILL. Do I understand the Senator to assert that by the law of New Jersey a tax is laid on each person who travels over that road?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I did not assert that. I say that operatively, practically—

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, inferentially.

Mr. HOWARD. In reality it is a tax, although it goes, perhaps, by another name. It is perfectly immaterial by what name the rose is called; you recognize it by its smell.

Mr. MORRILL. How would it smell if, instead of a revenue of ten cents on each passenger, it was in the shape of a tax, State, county, and town, on the company—would that be the same thing?

Mr. HOWARD. It would be the same thing, undoubtedly, because it comes out of the pocket of the passenger or shipper who uses the line of railroad. It is not denied that this tax comes out of the pocket of the passenger who travels from New York to Philadelphia, is it? Does he not pay it?

Mr. MORRILL. He does it upon the assumption that the company imposes it; but there is no evidence that the fare is increased by one mill by reason of this tax, and it is just as comprehensible and conclusive to argue that if a tax had been imposed on the business of the company, the company, by reason of that tax, would have imposed an additional sum on the traveler to meet that additional tax—just as conclusive, I submit to the honorable Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Maine, I think, differs a little in opinion as to the intention of this charter and the cognate acts of legislation from the persons who are in the actual exercise of the franchise. I read from a New Jersey document, emanating from the executive committee of the coalesced railroads represented by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, the following:

"It seems plain, from the acts incorporating these companies, and the testimony of those best conversant with the history of their incorporations, that it was the policy of the State, taking advantage of the geographical position of New Jersey, between the largest States and cities of the Union, to create a revenue by imposing tax or transit duty upon every person who should pass on the railroad across the State between those cities, from the Delaware river to the Raritan bay; but that it was not their design to impose any tax upon citizens of their own State for traveling between intermediate places."

"Here, again, the policy and intention of the State is most clearly indicated, in exempting her own citizens from the operation of this system of taxation."

I am indebted to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] for the extract which I have now read to the Senate. Again:

"The company believe that a careful consideration of the whole matter, as well from the provisions of the charter as from a recurrence to the period when it was granted, will produce the conviction that the transit duty was intended to be levied only on citizens of other States passing through New Jersey."

I will not ransack all the charters and acts of legislation connected with the charter for the purpose of eliciting the meaning of the charter. I take it for granted that these gentlemen who had the documents all before them were as competent as I should be after having read the same documents to state to the world what the purpose of this charter actually was and is. Now, sir, I understand it to be true in point of fact that for fourteen or fifteen years past the people of New Jersey have been entirely relieved from all State taxes by means of the money which has been accumulated in their treasury in the form of this specific passenger tax and freight tax between New York and Philadelphia. They have not paid a dollar, as I have been credibly informed, of State tax for that period of time, and all the expenses of the government of that State have been defrayed out of the proceeds of this imposition which the State of New Jersey has made upon passengers and freight passing through between New York and Philadelphia. I ask, sir, if Congress have the exclusive power of legislation over the subject, is it not time that the citizens of other States should be relieved from so gross an imposition upon their good nature? Is it entirely fair that the citizens of Michigan, of New York, of New Hampshire, of Maine, of Connecticut, of all the States passing over this railroad, should be made tributary to the selfish policy of New Jersey? Ought they to be compelled in this form to pay the expense of carrying on her State government?

And what is commerce, Mr. President? It includes not only an exchange of commodities in specie, not only the sale and delivery of personal chattels and the conveyance of lands for money or other consideration, but it includes navigation and travel; it includes, in the language of the Supreme Court, "intercourse" between the citizens of one State and those of another, whether that intercourse be for the purpose of trade and traffic or for anything else; whether it have profit in view or mere pleasure and friendship. The Supreme Court have held repeatedly—the principle has never been denied since the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden—that commerce, as spoken of in the Constitution, includes intercourse between the people of one State and the people of another, whatever may be the object of that intercourse. It includes, therefore, the right of free and untrammelled transit from one State to another. It includes the right of a man who walks on foot from an eastern State to visit his friends in the West, and it prohibits the State through which he may be compelled to pass from enacting any laws to obstruct his passage from his home to his family or his friends in the West or wherever he may see fit to go. He cannot be taxed as a citizen of another State passing through any one particular State; and his progress cannot be obstructed, or impeded, or embarrassed in any way whatever for the reason that he does not happen to be a citizen of the State wherein the burden is sought to be imposed upon him.

If I, in passing from New York to Philadelphia, can be directly or indirectly by the legislative power of New Jersey subjected to the payment of a tax of ten cents, I may be subjected to the payment of a tax of ten dollars or one hundred dollars. Nay, Mr. President, such is the character of the taxing power that if it can be exercised upon commerce and intercourse in this way, it can be carried so far as actually to exclude and keep out of the limits of one State citizens of another State. This monopolizing claim has no limits. There is no point at which it can be restrained. If the State Legislature has the power to impose a tax upon me, a citizen of Michigan, for going through the State of New Jersey, simply because I am a citizen of Michigan and not of New Jersey, they can prohibit me from going through the State of New Jersey at all; they can by legislation surround the State by a Chinese wall more difficult to scale than that famous wall which was erected to protect the Celestial empire against the incursion of the Tartars. There is no boundary, no limit to this inhospitable claim of power. Gentlemen declare that if we pass a bill recognizing simply the omnipotent power of Congress over the subject of commerce the Government is dissolved, a requiem is to be sung over its dead body, and the whole structure is to pass into one universal wreck and ruin. Sir, I do not read the Constitution of my country in this way. I discover in it an intention on the part of the fathers of the Republic to treat the citizens of the various States as equals, to allow the citizen of one State the same privilege in another State that he has in his own. I do not see any danger of encroachment upon the power of the States. The history of the Government from its initiation down to this moment contains the most lamentable and continuous lesson to us, admonishing us that its tendency has been and is to dissolution and separation rather than to a more strict and perfect union. Why, sir, one of the first attempts that was seriously made by a State against this great power of the Government to regulate commerce was made by the State of New York, which undertook by her Legislature to create a monopoly of the navigation of the navigable rivers of that State in the hands of the representatives of Robert Fulton.

Suppose the Supreme Court had decided otherwise than it did in that famous case of Gibbons vs. Ogden; the waters of the State of New York would to-day have been closed to other States under the authority of the State of New York, against all the foreign as well as domestic commerce, except upon onerous and intolerable conditions, by virtue of the same monopoly. Not many years ago a similar attempt was made by Maryland to obstruct foreign commerce by requiring that every importer of foreign goods who should land his cargo in that State should be at the trouble of going to the State authorities, taking out a license, and paying for it the sum of fifty dollars. The Supreme Court promptly and decisively laid its heavy hand on this pretension. I need not enumerate instances, Mr. President, of the attempts of States to encroach upon the just powers of Congress touching commerce. The absolute necessity of such a power in the central Government was, as we all know, the great procuring cause of the formation of the Constitution and the establishment of the Union.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maryland tells us that the bill assumes to authorize a State railroad company to carry persons and property beyond the terminus of its road, to authorize a company to make connection and even to make a road. In the warmth of the honorable Senator's opposition to this bill, it seems to me he has made on this subject assertions which he will see occasion to review, if not to recall. Does the bill before us assume to authorize a company in New Jersey to carry persons and property beyond the terminus of its road? Does it assume to impart a new and additional faculty to those corporations, by which they can construct new roads, or parts of new roads, and thus extend their franchise by means of this bill? No, sir; the bill properly interpreted means no such thing.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member read that part of it?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; I was about to do so. The bill provides that "every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors, and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized" to do what? Extend its road? Carry goods or passengers ultra viam, beyond the road, beyond the terminus or off the road? No, sir; but "to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property, on their way from any State to another State."

Now, I ask the honorable Senator whether this is granting to a railroad company an authority to transport passengers or freight to anywhere but on and over its road.

Mr. JOHNSON. And connections.

Mr. HOWARD. I will come to that. The honorable Senator will admit that already the State corporation has the authority to transport passengers and freight over and upon its road. There is no doubt about that; otherwise it would be a very useless corporation. But, says the honorable Senator, it also has the right to carry freight and passengers upon and over its connections. Sir, what is meant in the bill by the words, "connections, boats, bridges, and ferries?" Plainly, the connections which belong to the particular corporation, collateral railroads over which such corporation has a right to carry freight and passengers; connections which become such lawfully and properly under the legislation of New Jersey, by contract or by charter; connections which may be here regarded as the property of the particular company; connections which are its property precisely in the same sense in which boats, bridges, and ferries are its property; connections, boats, &c., the use of which, for purposes of transportation, the railroad legitimately has, possesses, and enjoys under State laws; and that is all that is meant. It does not go a single inch beyond its own chartered rights, established by the State. The bill assumes in no possible sense to impart to a State corporation any faculty, franchise, license, or right whatever, except such as may be already granted to it by the State save to this extent: it declares that although under its charter it may be prohibited from carrying freight and passengers which are bound from one State into another, the particular corporation shall have the right in spite of the prohibition to carry on this inter-State commerce. That is the effect and the sole effect of this bill.

Let me illustrate. Suppose the charter of New Jersey, as it seems to have done, prohibits any other railroad company in that State except the Camden and Amboy from transporting freight or passengers bound from one State to another State through New Jersey; suppose the State prohibits one of its corporations from carrying passengers and freight thus destined; the bill declares that the State corporation so prohibited shall have the right to transport such passengers and freight; and I insist that we have a perfect constitutional authority to do so under the power to regulate commerce among the States.

Railroad corporations are created for the purpose of transportation. They are in a broad sense common carriers as known in the common law, and they may carry commodities and passengers bound from one State to another. No State has a right to make a discrimination between such commerce and its purely internal commerce, such a discrimination being inconsistent with the exclusive power of Congress over commerce.

But the honorable Senator takes another objection to the bill; he objects to its passage because, he says, if we can pass it we may regulate tolls upon State railroads; we may increase the tolls; and he seems to discover in the future the danger of Congress interfering with State railroads by assuming to regulate the tolls upon property passing through from one State into another. It is a sufficient answer to this objection, if it is deserving of the name, that it has no place; it is not founded upon any clause of the bill; it does not grow out of its language or intention, but is a mere apprehension of the honorable Senator that at some future day Congress may take it into their head to interfere with the tolls upon State railroads. Mr. President, have we not precisely the same power over commerce among the States that we possess over foreign commerce? Will the honorable Senator deny it? Will he undertake to limit the power of Congress in the one case and not in the other? Whatever may be the extent of this commercial power, Congress possesses it and the whole of it; and if that power extends so far as to grasp within itself the tolls upon passengers or merchandise transported from one State to another, so be it; we can neither enlarge nor restrain it. When the proper occasion shall present itself it will be for us to determine, if we do possess the power, whether to exercise it or omit to exercise it; and this is a sufficient answer to the argument of the Senator from Maryland upon that subject.

But, sir, in reference to foreign commerce, we have precisely the same power, and always have had it; and if there is any danger that we shall interfere injuriously or oppressively in the commerce among the States and control the States, has not the same danger existed ever since the commencement of the Government? And can the honorable Senator point to a single case where the United States have assumed to regulate the freights between foreign countries and the United States, or the price of passages, or anything of the kind? I apprehend he will find himself at a loss to discover any such precedent. While, at the same time, we know that every State of the Union has always interfered in some form in regulating tolls upon bridges, turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the Government of the United States have never exercised the power in any instance, as far as I have been able to ascertain. So I think that this objection of the honorable Senator from Maryland, that by passing this bill we shall establish a precedent of which we can avail ourselves hereafter to regulate tolls upon State railroads, is unfounded, rather in the nature of an alarm than an argument.

I will not undertake to deny that Congress might, in an exigency, regulate the price of freight and passage money upon the ocean. The time may come when the exercise of such a power will become necessary. We have never, thus far, exercised it, to be sure; we have not seen the necessity of exercising it. And for the same reason I shall not deny that Congress have the power to regulate even tolls in the matter of trade among the States, though we have never exercised it, nor assumed to exercise it, thus far. I am not, however, by such objections to be frightened out of my position, that the power of Congress is just as exclusive over the one kind of commerce as the other.

His last objection is that if Congress may pass a bill authorizing every railroad to carry property bound from one State to another, as this bill does, it may make a road; that it may incorporate a company for the purpose of carrying on commerce among the States, and for this purpose make a road. This objection does not frighten me; nor will I undertake to say that Congress is totally disabled from creating a corporation for the purpose of carrying on commerce among the States; it is not necessary to deny even this power. If it could create such a corporation, it could undoubtedly authorize the corporation to make a road for the purpose of carrying on this commerce; but the bill before us does not contemplate the making of a road or any part of a road; so that I do not see that the last two objections of the honorable Senator to this bill, in which he seems to apprehend that Congress may do this thing or the other thing in the future, have the slightest weight in the discussion of the present bill.

The simple questions are, is this measure in accordance with the Constitution? Are we authorized to give this faculty and power to a State corporation, under the Constitution, or are we restrained from it? I have no doubt whatever upon the subject. I have no doubt that we have full authority to pass the bill in the very language which it contains; and I have just as little doubt that the interests of the public, the interests of the citizens of the various States who have been made tributary to New Jersey for so many years, and the interests of the whole commercial world visiting New York and Philadelphia require that this unblushing, persevering, corrupt, and corrupting monopoly of New Jersey ought to be extinguished; and I trust there will be votes enough and determination enough on the part of the Senate to put a complete extinguisher upon it. It has cursed the land long enough; and the people, with united voice, are crying against it. I trust we shall obey that voice.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am sometimes made to feel that there is nothing so timid and so abject as the Government of the United States. Sometimes, thank God, I am made to see that there is nothing grander or more heroic. The power of this Government and its authority is so often and so obstinately disputed that I really get to feeling at times as if it was made to look at and not to act. I have scarcely heard a proposition introduced into this body since I have had the honor of a seat here that has not found some one to deny the authority of Congress to enact it. This little proposition now before the Senate I think we have been straining at for something like two years, trying to swallow it. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in the very morning of its appearance, told us it was unconstitutional; and when he pronounces upon the Constitution, if he does not create convictions or change convictions, he is apt to influence them very much. I have seen a mesmeric experimenter lay his cane down on the floor before his victim, and make the victim think it was a serpent and travel all about the room to dodge it and to avoid it. Here is a bill as harmless, as inoffensive, as any man's walking-stick; and yet, because the Senator from Maryland told the Senate some time ago that it really was a violation of the Constitution, we have been hesitating all this time as to whether we should adopt it or not.

What is this little thing that we dare not enact into a law? It says that every railroad company in the United States using steam, may carry over its road the Government supplies, passengers, troops, mails, freight, &c., on their way from one State to another. A railroad is a highway, I suppose. These passengers, troops, supplies, mails, and freights are commerce; they are the incident of commerce; they make up commerce; they are included within the term "commerce." What is this bill, then? A simple declaration that commerce may move over all the highways in any of the States. That is all there is of it. And yet we are told we cannot make that declaration. Why can we not make that declaration? It is said that one of the States, shoved in accidentally between two of the great metropolitan cities of the United States—New York and Philadelphia—has declared that of the highways running through its borders, only one of them shall carry these mails, troops, passengers, and freight; in other words, a State lying between New York and Philadelphia has declared that commerce between one State and another shall move only upon one of its highways; and that enactment lies in the way of our making this.

If that be so I ask, who controls the commerce between New York and Philadelphia? Who regulates it? The United States or the State of New Jersey? The State of New Jersey says it shall go over one particular way, and having said so we are told that the United States cannot say to the contrary. Why, sir, the State of New Jersey regulates commerce between those two cities if that be the case, and the Congress of the United States does not regulate it. That is as patent to me as the light above us. But the Constitution says that Congress may regulate commerce between the States, and not any one of the States. And, Mr. President, I want to remark here that this Congress was created, this Government was formed as much for the purpose of taking this very control from the States as for any other one purpose. One of the leading objects, one of the moving inducements to aggregate the original States into one supreme Government was the fact that independent of any such general control the several States did impose just such restrictions, limitations, and disabilities upon the movement of commerce between the different States. If we disclaim this power, therefore, now, we ignore one of the highest and most beneficent purposes had in view in the organization of this Government.

The argument urged against the exercise of this authority is very brief. It is said that Congress cannot authorize the building of a railway in one of the States; that that is a power to be exercised exclusively by the State; and the State having the exclusive right to authorize the construction of a road within its limits, it must have the right to impose just such terms upon the construction of the road as it sees fit. In the first place, I deny the premises. I deny that the Congress of the United States cannot authorize the building of a highway within one of the States. But conceding that proposition to be correct, the deductions which are drawn from it I deny altogether. Admitting the law to be that only the Legislature of New Jersey can authorize the construction of a railway within her limits, I do not concede in that state of the law that she is authorized to impose just such terms upon the use of the railway after it is constructed as she sees fit; for it is impossible that her right, or the right of any State, to build a railway, or to authorize the building of a railway, can be more absolute and unlimited than is the right of the United States to regulate commerce. Here is the fact that different railways, different highways operated by steam, are existing in a particular State; here is the fact that each one of them is authorized by the law of that State; but here is the other fact that the right to regulate commerce on those highways is in the Congress of the United States. I conclude that this power of the several States to impose terms upon the companies constructing railways must be exercised in subordination to our authority to regulate commerce, or the reverse of this must be true, and our authority to regulate commerce must be held in subordination to the power of the States to construct railways.

Mr. GRIMES. Does our power go so far as to regulate the tolls?

Mr. HOWE. The question is put to me if our power goes so far as to regulate tolls upon commerce. Just how that power is to be exercised I do not now say; but that we have the power to regulate tolls in some way, if it be necessary, I have no more doubt than I have of our right to make appropriations. If there was but one road through which the commerce from the Atlantic sea-board could reach the valley of the Mississippi, and that led through the State of New York, and the State of New York, in the interest of her canal system, was pleased to say that all of this commerce should go on her canals and none of it on her railways, does any one tell me, in view of our Constitution, that New York could stand at the gateway of her canals and levy just such tolls as she saw fit upon the commerce flowing between the East and the West? There are two empires; the commerce flowing between them is of immense importance to the world; is it at the mercy, under our Constitution, of any one State? Whether we could say to the State of New York, "You must reduce your tolls on that canal to meet the requirements, or what we judge to be the requirements, of the country;" or whether we could say, "We will build a new canal in the interests of the nation and for the life of this great commerce," I will not stop to argue or to assert; but I do say most emphatically that it is not in the power of any one State to burden the commerce moving onward between the different States beyond the will of the nation. That question is not here. This is not a question of regulating tolls; it is a question of regulating commerce; it is a question of enabling commerce to move between different highways leading between the same points.

I said that either this authority to authorize the construction of railways must be exercised by the States in subordination to our authority to regulate commerce, or our authority to regulate commerce must be exercised in subordination to the authority of the States to construct railways or to authorize the construction of railways. I conclude that the power of the State, even if it be exclusive over the given subject, must be exercised in subordination to the authority of the nation, because the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in accordance with it are declared to be the supreme law of the land, anything in the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. If the law of the State is not subordinate to the law of the United States, then the Constitution of the United States is not the supreme law.

But I said I denied that the power to build railways or authorize the construction of railways is exclusively in the several States. I have no manner of doubt, if it were adjudged by Congress necessary and expedient to promote the commercial interests of the United States, to advance the interests of commerce moving between State and State, to build a railway, that we might authorize the construction of a railway or build it ourselves. It is an instrument of commerce, and if we judge it expedient to build one, who shall control the exercise of our discretion? I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate with arguing that question. It seems to me it has been decided, if any question ever was decided. It seems to me the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed that very power in the case of the Wheeling bridge.

Mr. CRESWELL. The power to build a bridge?

Mr. HOWE. The power to build a railway; not in so many words, but by the most necessary implication. There was a company authorized by the States of Virginia and Ohio to build a bridge across the Ohio river, every inch of which was either in the State of Virginia or in the State of Ohio.

Mr. MORRILL. Virginia.

Mr. HOWE. Well, it was in one State or the other. The company was authorized by the laws of a State to build a bridge. A State—the State of Pennsylvania—complained of it as an injury to her interests, as a wrong done to her, and declared the structure to be illegal, and appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States to redress that wrong. The Supreme Court heard that complaint, pronounced that structure to be illegal, and adjudged that it be abated, that it be removed. Congress enacted a law declaring that that bridge was legal, was a lawful structure.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a remark just here?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The Congress of the United States did nothing more than this: the Supreme Court, on an examination of the facts, had decided it to be an obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river; and Congress, having the supreme jurisdiction of the commerce of that river, declared it was not an obstruction, it being the judge. That is all they did.

Mr. HOWE. I think it did more. I think the Supreme Court had declared that bridge to be illegal.

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; they declared it an obstruction. The whole case turned on the question of whether it was an obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river. The court found that it was an obstruction.

Mr. HOWE. And therefore not a lawful structure.

Mr. MORRILL. And therefore the State of Virginia had not a right to obstruct a common highway. The Congress of the United States said, we have a right to say that it shall stand notwithstanding that fact. That is what they said.

Mr. HOWE. The Supreme Court said, I repeat, that it was not a lawful structure. The reason why it was not a lawful structure, in their judgment, was precisely what my friend from Maine says, because it obstructed a highway, not leading through the State of Pennsylvania, which complained, but leading to the State of Pennsylvania, which complained. That is what gave the State of Pennsylvania a right to redress; the fact that it obstructed commerce moving to and from Pennsylvania. It obstructed the movement of that commerce. So the court said. They said it must be abated. Congress said, in defiance of the legal rights as adjudicated, passed into judgment, of the State of Pennsylvania, "It is not an unlawful, but a lawful, structure, and shall stand, the judgment of the court to the contrary notwithstanding." Congress did not authorize the building of a bridge, but finding a bridge constructed by a private corporation, without authority of law, they said "It shall have the authority of law." Pennsylvania complained. It was the exercise of authority within the limits of a State—the State of Virginia—to maintain a bridge which Pennsylvania had not authorized; Virginia attempted to authorize it, but had not the authority to authorize it, simply because it was a wrong to another State. I cannot for my life conceive why that power, which the United States exercised in Virginia to the injury of the adjudged rights of Pennsylvania, could not have been just as well exercised in Pennsylvania if the call for its exercise had been made from Pennsylvania. I must insist, therefore, that the court has passed upon and has affirmed, most substantially and most clearly, the right of the United States, if they see fit, to authorize the construction of railways within States in the interests of commerce.

Mr. President, if it were not for the peculiar course this debate has taken I think it would be an astounding thing for us to be told that in the face and eyes of the plain, constitutional declaration of our right to regulate commerce, a State had been found to assert the right of controlling all the commerce through its limits to go over one channel to the exclusion of another. I think it would have astonished us to be told that a State had started such an authority; but it has been asserted, and it is gravely argued that we are bound by it. I hope that will not be the conclusion of the Senate. I do wish that the Congress of the United States could be emancipated some time or other from this notion, that not only was it bound by the authority of the people of all the States, but it was bound in every direction by the authority of any one of the States. I am as strict a constructionist of the Constitution, it seems to me, as anybody ought to be; I am as jealous of allowing the Government of the United States to interfere in what are the domestic concerns (to use an old-fashioned, and, I thank God, an out of fashion form of expression) of a State; that is to say, what concerns its own people, its own affairs, and its own prosperity alone. But the commerce which moves between New York and Philadelphia is not an affair which concerns the State of New Jersey. That is an affair which concerns all the United States, and concerns vastly more the States of New York and Pennsylvania than it does the State of New Jersey. That is not a domestic interest; that is not a domestic concern; that is not a domestic affair. That is one of the affairs which, as I said in the outset, was the very purpose of adopting this Constitution, in order to place it under the control and under the direction of the United States of America; and if this authority claimed on the part of New Jersey is affirmed any longer by the Legislature of the United States, you have sacrificed, you have voluntarily abandoned, one of the dearest interests you ever had, or can hope to have, in the Government.

Mr. CRESWELL. I propose to make a few remarks upon the pending bill; but before entering upon what I have to say, I desire to suggest an amendment to the bill as it now stands. It is to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That Congress may, at any time hereafter, alter, amend, or repeal this act at pleasure.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no need of the words "at pleasure."

Mr. CRESWELL. It is not a very long section, and if there should be two or three words in excess, I do not think they will do much damage. It will not be much of a trial to the gentleman's eyes to read the whole of the amendment.

Mr. President, this measure has engaged the attention of the Senate during the greater part of the last session and during so much of this session as has passed. One matter which has excited my suspicion somewhat with reference to the question, has been the difficulty of bringing its advocates to a precise presentation of their case. When we come to inspect the bill we find, in the preamble of it, that gentlemen claim to pass it under three of the powers granted to Congress in the Constitution. When driven from the refuge which they seek under any specified power, they immediately resort to a second, and if driven from that, to a third, and if driven from the third, they then claim, under the combined powers of all, that Congress has the right to pass this bill.

I shall refer particularly to the argument of the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] with reference to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, because from the known, acknowledged ability of that gentleman, his untiring industry which, like faith, seems sometimes to move mountains, and his immense erudition, I am satisfied if no authority can be found under the Constitution for the passage of this bill by that gentleman, it is only because none exists.

In the preamble to the bill, the power to pass it is claimed, first, under the clause to regulate commerce among the several States; second, the power to establish post roads; and third, the authority to raise and support armies; and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts considered those powers in the order in which they are named. For the purposes of my argument I shall reverse his line of proceeding.

He cites, as his only authority for the power as claimed under the clause to raise and support armies, the action of the last Congress with reference to the general management of the railroads of the country. I can hardly think that the Senator, upon reflection, would claim that act as a precedent, or insist that Congress should now exercise the power which it did by that act, namely, to place all the railroads in the country under the specific and exclusive charge of the military authorities; for that is the precise language of that act. A clause of the first section authorized the Government—

"To place under military control all the officers, agents, and employees belonging to the telegraph and railroad lines thus taken possession of by the President, so that they shall be considered as a post road and a part of the military establishment of the United States, subject to all the restrictions imposed by the Rules and Articles of War."

The second section provided that all attempts by any parties whatever to interfere with the exercise of the power granted in the bill should be punished "as a military offense by death or such other penalty as a court-martial may impose."

The third section authorized the appointment of three commissioners to assess the damages suffered by reason of the seizure of the railroad or telegraph lines under the act.

In the fourth section it was provided—

"That the transportation of troops, munitions of war, equipments, military property, and stores throughout the United States shall be under the immediate control and supervision of the Secretary of War and such agents as he may appoint; and all rules, regulations, articles, usages, and laws in conflict with this provision are hereby annulled."

The fifth section declares—

"That the provisions of this act, so far as it relates to the operating and using said railroads and telegraphs, shall not be in force any longer than is necessary for the suppression of the rebellion."

The very authority which the gentleman cites shows that the power which he claims is something altogether different from that which was exercised in that case. That was an exercise of the military power of the Government during the war in an effort to protect and to preserve itself; but as the rebellion has been suppressed no such necessity now rests upon the Government to claim the exercise of any such power, and of course it cannot exist. Indeed, by the terms of the law it is no longer operative.

In the next place, this power is claimed under the clause of the Constitution with reference to the establishment of post offices and post roads. It is nowhere stated, and it cannot be stated with truth, that in any part of the country over which it is now proposed to extend the authority of Congress there is any denial of the right of the Government to transmit mails. I believe that every railroad company in the land is already subjected to that clause of the Constitution, and willingly submits to the authority of the Government in the transmission of its mails. One thing is certain: they are all anxious to secure contracts for that purpose with the Government, and so far from the States attempting to interfere with it, it is their manifest interest to offer every possible facility for the transmission of the mails with a view to the accommodation of their own citizens; and the difficulty is, not that the States refuse to the Government the use of their roads for postal purposes, but that the States cannot procure from the General Government a sufficient number of post offices and the assignment of a sufficient number of post roads. Applications come every day to the Government for that purpose.

The power, if it exists anywhere, must exist under the clause to regulate commerce. I was somewhat amused at the argument adduced by the Senator who has just taken his seat. He began by calling this a "little bill," and he said it was as harmless as any man's walking-stick, but before he took his seat he showed that that walking-stick had assumed the dimensions of a huge bludgeon, with which he would knock out the brains of every railroad company in the land. It had, in his hands, and according to the powers that he claimed for the General Government, sufficient power to destroy the active capital now invested in railroads, amounting to $1,200,000,000; because he distinctly claimed that in the Wheeling bridge case the Supreme Court had decided that Congress had the right to construct railroads, through and over any of the States without their consent.

Mr. HOWE. It was the Constitution that I made the bludgeon out of, not this bill.

Mr. CRESWELL. Very good. The gentleman seeks by this bill to exercise the power in whole or in part. His argument was that Congress had the power, not only to prescribe terms and to confer additional franchises upon railroad corporations already existing under the authority of the States, but that Congress had the right to make railroads and, in the exercise of the power over internal commerce, to create corporations for that purpose. Now, sir, I know that I may be charged with temerity, and that I may perhaps subject myself to a rebuke from the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts, when I state that in my opinion the Constitution of the United States imposes some limitation upon the power of the General Government, and that the people who ordained and established that instrument did not thereby confer imperial powers upon the Government of the United States. That may be a grave offense. If so, I apologize to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. No; the Senator does not owe me any apology. I simply want to say that over the subject of the regulation of commerce I think the Constitution does confer on this Congress imperial power.

Mr. CRESWELL. So far as it goes; but the question is, how far does it go? The gentleman extends it so far as to destroy all the powers and all the rights of the States. He makes not only the power as granted by the fathers in the Constitution imperial and exclusive, but he denies all power to the States over their own soil. He usurps from them the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The argument of my distinguished friend becomes a little more significant when we look at certain bills which have recently been introduced into the House of Representatives; and of which it would seem that this bill is the forerunner. One of them is House bill No. 96, "to provide for the construction of a line of railway communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and to constitute the same a public highway and a military road and postal route of the United States;" and upon looking through that bill, I find in the sixth section thereof this provision:

That said corporation is hereby empowered to purchase, lease, receive, and hold such real estate or other property as may be necessary in accomplishing the objects for which this incorporation is granted; and may, by their agents, engineers, contractors, or workmen, immediately enter upon, take possession of, and use all such real estate and property as may be necessary for the construction, maintenance, and operation of their said railway, and the accommodations requisite and appertaining thereto. But all real estate or property thus entered upon and appropriated by said corporation, which are not donations, shall be purchased by said corporation of the owner or owners of the same, at a price to be mutually agreed upon between them. And in case of disagreement as to price, and before the final completion of said railway and its appurtenances, the said corporation, or the owner or owners of such real estate or property, shall apply by petition to one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

And he is to appoint commissioners to view, value, condemn, and appropriate the land.

I challenge the gentleman from Massachusetts, with all his erudition, and I challenge the gentleman from Wisconsin, with all his ideas of a liberal interpretation of the Constitution, to adduce one solitary instance wherein any such power has been claimed or exercised by the Congress of the United States. That there are some things which the Congress cannot do in the exercise of its powers over foreign and domestic commerce there cannot be a doubt. There are two classes of powers which are vested in the General Government under the Constitution; one consists of powers affecting relations which grow out of the Union itself as between different States; the other consists of powers in relation to matters over which, previous to the adoption of the Constitution, the States themselves had exclusive jurisdiction, and which previously existed in the States; and the doctrine has been maintained in the courts, so far as I have been able to gather it from the decisions, that as to the first class of powers Congress may exert exclusive jurisdiction without an exclusive grant of power in the terms of the Constitution; and that as to the other it required from the States an exclusive grant in terms in the Constitution; otherwise, it was not vested in the General Government. Now, sir, that the States have the exclusive right to their own territory, and had before the adoption of the Constitution, nobody can doubt; and I think it has been reserved for these latter days for gentlemen gravely to maintain that the General Government can, for the purpose of commerce, take without the consent or authority of the States a portion of their territory.

Why, sir, the Constitution provides, in so many words, that exclusive authority over any portion of the States, even for the purposes of forts and dock-yards, cannot be acquired by the United States except by the consent of the States; and if there is anything of authority due to the opinions of the eminent men who in the early history of the Republic were deemed the expounders of the Constitution, the gentleman will be left without even the shadow of a doubt from which to draw comfort. I have some books before me containing the opinions of three persons who are, I admit, somewhat old fashioned. One of them is Mr. Madison, another Mr. Jefferson, and the other is Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton in his day was considered rather a liberal interpreter of the Constitution, and was the acknowledged leader of the latitudinarian school, as it was called; but it seems he was far behind the learning of this advanced age. Mr. Hamilton, in his great argument, as submitted to General Washington on the power of the Congress of the United States to establish a corporation for the purposes of the National Bank, excludes from the powers of the General Government all authority to make any work of internal improvement requiring that they should appropriate any portion of the land within the States without their consent; but I will refer first in order to what occurred in the Convention to form the Constitution of the United States. I quote from Elliot's Debates, volume five, page 543:

"Dr. FRANKLIN moved to add, after the words 'post roads,' article one, section eight, a power 'to provide for cutting canals where deemed necessary.'"

"Mr. WILSON seconded the motion."

This was a motion to amend a clause now in the Constitution. I may say here that in that day railroads were unknown, and canals were the only great mode of intercommunication between distant points for heavy articles of commerce.

"Mr. SHERMAN objected. The expense, in such cases, will fall on the United States and the benefit accrue to the places where the canals may be cut."

"Mr. WILSON. Instead of being an expense to the United States they may be made a source of revenue."

"Mr. MADISON suggested an enlargement of the motion into a power 'to grant charters of incorporation where the interest of the United States might require, and the legislative provisions of individual States may be incompetent.'"

Mr. Madison was a friend of the motion; he desired to have the power granted to the United States.

"His primary object was, however, to secure an easy communication between the States, which the free intercourse now to be opened seemed local for. The political obstacles being removed, a removal of the natural ones, as far as possible, ought to follow."

"Mr. RANDOLPH seconded the proposition."

"Mr. KING thought the power unnecessary."

"Mr. WILSON. It is necessary to prevent a State from obstructing the general welfare."

Putting it upon the very ground gentlemen now do.

"Mr. KING. The States will be prejudiced and divided into parties by it. In Philadelphia and New York it will be referred to the establishment of a bank, which has been a subject of contention in those cities."

In other places it will be referred to mercantile monopolies."

Precisely the ground upon which gentlemen now claim the power.

"Mr. WILSON mentioned the importance of facilitating, by canals, the communication with the western settlements. As to banks, he did not think, with Mr. King, that the power, in that point of view, would excite the prejudices and parties apprehended. As to mercantile monopolies, they are already included in the power to regulate trade."

"Colonel MASON was for limiting the power to the single case of canals. He was afraid of monopolies of every sort, which he did not think were by any means already implied by the Constitution, as supposed by Mr. Wilson."

"The motion being so modified as to admit a distinct question, specifying and limited to the case of canals—"

"Pennsylvania, Virginia, Georgia, ay—3; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, no—8."

"The other part fell, of course, as including the power rejected."

Thus it appears that there was a flat refusal on the part of the Convention to insert that power in the Constitution; but there are some other authorities. Mr. Madison at a late period of his life, January 6, 1831, in a letter to Mr. Reynolds Chapman, who seems to have written a treatise, which was highly esteemed, on the constitutional powers of the Government, used the following language:

"Canals as an item in the general improvement of the country have always appeared to me not to be embraced by the authority of Congress. It may be remarked that Mr. Hamilton, in his report on the bank, when enlarging the range of construction to the utmost of his ingenuity, admitted that canals were beyond the sphere of Federal legislation."

Again, in the same letter, Mr. Madison said:

"Perhaps I ought not to omit the remark that although I concur in the defect of powers in Congress on the subject of internal improvements, my abstract opinion has been that, in the case of canals particularly, the power would have been properly vested in Congress."

"It was more than once proposed in the Convention of 1787, and rejected, from an apprehension chiefly that it might prove an obstacle to the adoption of the Constitution."

"It cannot be denied that the abuse to which the exercise of the power in question has appeared to be liable in the hands of Congress is a heavy weight in the scale opposed to it. But may not the evil have grown, in a great degree, out of a casual redundancy of revenue, and a temporary apathy to a burden bearing indirectly on the people, and mingled, moreover, with the discharge of debts of peculiar sanctity? It might not happen, under ordinary circumstances, that taxes even of the most disguised kind would escape a wakeful control in the imposition and application of them. The late reduction of duties on certain imports, and the calculated approach of the extinguishment of the public debt, have evidently turned the popular attention to the subject of taxes in a degree quite new, and it is more likely to increase than to relax. In the event of an amendment of the Constitution guards might be devised against a misuse of the power without defeating an important exercise of it. If I err, or am too sanguine in the views I indulge, it must be ascribed to my conviction that canals, railroads and turnpikes are at once the criteria of a wise policy and causes of national prosperity; that the want of them will be a reproach to our republican system, if excluding them; and that the exclusion, to a mortifying extent, will ensue if the power be not lodged where alone it can have its due effect."

Mr. Madison was as zealous an advocate for railroads, canals, and other improvements as any gentleman on this floor, and yet he frankly admitted that no such power existed, and could only be exercised by the Government after a constitutional amendment granting the power.

One of the most important and interesting state papers upon this subject of internal improvements, under the powers of Congress, is the report that was made by Mr. Albert Gallatin, April 4, 1808. After reviewing the principal works of internal improvement, as they then existed in the country, or had, at that day, been projected, Mr. Gallatin proceeds to consider the question as to how far and in what way the General Government might afford assistance to those works; and he says:

"The manner in which the public moneys may be applied to such objects, remains to be considered."

"It is evident that the United States cannot under the Constitution open any road or canal without the consent of the State through which such road or canal must pass. In order, therefore, to remove every impediment to a national plan of internal improvements, an amendment to the Constitution was suggested by the Executive (referring to Mr. Jefferson) when the subject was recommended to the consideration of Congress. Until this be obtained, the assent of the States being necessary for each improvement, the modifications under which that assent may be given, will necessarily control the manner of applying the money. It may be, however, observed that in relation to the specific improvements which have been suggested, there is hardly any which is not either already authorized by the States respectively, or so immediately beneficial to them as to render it highly probable that no material difficulty will be experienced in that respect."

Then I have before me the message of Mr. Jefferson, in which he recommends that Congress propose a constitutional amendment for the adoption of the States for the very purpose of conferring upon the General Government this power.

Now, sir, I have given, the opinions of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Madison, who were considered as the respective heads of the three great schools of constitutional interpretation, and they all agree in the opinion that there was no such power in the General Government. But the Senator from Wisconsin cited with some degree of satisfaction an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McLean on that subject, from which he drew an inference favorable to his view of the question. The gentleman forgot a decision made by the same learned judge, reported by himself in the sixth volume of his Reports, page 524, in the case known as the Rock Island bridge case, in which he says, upon the precise point—

"Under the commercial power Congress may declare what shall constitute an obstruction or nuisance by a general regulation, and provide for its abatement by indictment or information through the Attorney General; but neither under this power, nor under the power to establish post roads, can Congress construct a bridge over navigable water. This belongs to the local or State authority within which the work is to be done. But this authority must be so exercised as not materially to conflict with the paramount power to regulate commerce."

"If Congress can construct a bridge over a navigable water under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post roads, on the same principle it may make turnpike or railroads throughout the country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported; and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas, and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from there can be no others except the discretion of Congress."

Without further reference to the books, I think, Mr. President, it is perfectly safe to leave the question of constitutional power on the authorities cited. And unless gentlemen can controvert these authorities it seems to me they have no standing before the Senate in claiming that any such power should be exercised. I am aware, however, that when driven from the open field they will say that the argument does not apply to them, because they do not attempt by this bill to exercise any such power, inasmuch as they do not propose to build a railroad. But if we look at the bill, it will be found to authorize all railroad companies throughout the country whose roads are worked by steam to carry upon and over their roads, connections, ferries, boats, and bridges, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with the roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination. It authorizes these roads to carry freight and passengers and to charge compensation therefor, and to connect with other roads throughout the country.

Now, sir, either the bill is worth something or nothing. If it conveys no power, invests in these roads no right which did not exist under State authority, then the bill is utterly useless and nugatory; but I apprehend that the friends of this measure expect to accomplish something by the legislation they propose. They expect that these roads will, under the provisions of this bill, derive and exercise rights and franchises which have been denied to them by the States. This bill if it be operative at all must confer privileges which do not already exist. That, in my judgment, is the exercise of the same power, not perhaps the same in extent, but certainly the same in kind, which is claimed by those who assert that the General Government has the power to construct railroads and to build canals from one end of the Union to the other; an argument just as strong can be made against the one as against the other upon the general principle of want of power.

The companies are authorized to carry passengers and freight "upon and over their roads," &c., and "to receive compensation therefor." Now, sir, if it be doubted whether these companies have or can have under any bill passed by Congress any right to charge tolls, certainly that argument may be applied to this bill; and the same objection may be made to that provision in regard to compensation. But the object of the bill, as it is claimed by its friends, is to destroy monopoly; and the only case cited by gentlemen who argue in favor of its passage is the case presented by the condition of affairs in New Jersey. It should be considered that under the phraseology of this bill these railroad companies are only "authorized" to connect with other roads. They are not obliged to connect with other roads; and, in my judgment, the result will be that they will exercise such a discretion that all the stronger roads will unite to the exclusion of all the weaker, and instead of a monopoly confined to the State of New Jersey, you will have a monopoly stretching from Boston to New Orleans, and wielding an amount of capital that will be strong enough to draw all the trade of the country along the lines of their railroads, and so far to paralyze the spirit of enterprise as to prevent the construction of any other roads to compete with them; so that if I am right, this bill, instead of destroying existing monopolies, will rather operate the other way. It will serve as a nursery for monopolies, and will enable one great monopoly, by destroying all competing roads, to exert a pernicious influence upon the legislation of the country and all its industrial interests.

Mr. President, I am not speaking in the interest of any railroad company; I am as willing as the friends of this bill to destroy all monopolies wheresoever found; but I do speak in the interest of the State which I in part represent upon this floor. I object to the passage of this measure because I believe it will have a most injurious effect upon the commercial interests of the country, and especially upon the great interest which is now known as the railroad interest. Sir, gentlemen talk of the exercise of the power of constructing railroads by the States as if, instead of having accomplished more than the industry and enterprise of peaceful men ever accomplished before in the history of the world in the same period, they had been resting supinely and had really accomplished nothing. The Census Report for 1860 shows that in the preceding decade there had been built lines of railroad stretching over 22,204 miles, and that in the same period $854,900,681 had been invested in railroads in this country. All that money was invested upon the security afforded by State charters; much of it was brought from abroad; and a large part of it was gathered from other localities than those in which the roads were constructed. If Congress shall now assume the right to revise these charters and to restrict them, notwithstanding the fact that ever since the adoption of the Constitution no one has claimed such a right, and that it has been conceded that the authority to construct railroads, canals, and all works of internal improvement except so far as the Government might aid them by making contributions in money or lands, belonged to the States, the effect, in my judgment, will be most disastrous upon this great interest.

How is it with my own State? I find, on looking over the last report of the comptroller of the State, that Maryland, without any aid from extraneous sources except what capital she could borrow upon her State faith, has invested in public improvements the sum of $35,844,816. Of that money she has lost entirely $27,090,019, and all that she received from all sources in the shape of income from her investments in internal improvements, amounted during the last year ending 30th September, 1865, to $544,162 82. On all this sum of nearly $36,000,000 she has received about one and a half per cent. in the way of returns.

It is not only unconstitutional but it is unjust in the extreme for Congress to attempt to usurp this power at this late day. To do so is to cripple the States most seriously in their resources. To do so is to cause Maryland as one of them to lose, not only the $27,000,000 of unproductive capital which she has invested in these works, but the $7,764,797 which are still productive.

Gentlemen from the West will bear with me while I present to them one consideration touching this subject. The policy of Maryland has always been most liberal upon the subject of internal improvements. She has exerted herself to the utmost to facilitate the commercial connections between the several States. She has never presented herself as a barrier between the States of the North or the East or the West and the national capital. She has afforded them facilities to an extent which almost proved ruinous to her own financial system.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. CRESWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to dispute the assertion of the honorable Senator from Maryland as to the policy of his State, but I wish to make a suggestion now in regard to the great road of that State to which he alludes, which I think will not do him or the road or the State of Maryland any harm. I think that there are complaints and just complaints to be made against the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, and as one of the small complaints which they ought at once to avoid, is the difficulty they interpose in transporting baggage and passengers through the city of Baltimore.

Mr. CRESWELL. The Senator will pardon me; I will inform him that I am not the baggage master of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but the Senator was saying that the State of Maryland and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company had been very liberal. It seems to me that they have not been so liberal.

Mr. CRESWELL. I spoke of the State of Maryland, not of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. You cannot speak of the State of Maryland in this connection without speaking of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. CRESWELL. I was speaking of the conduct of the State of Maryland with reference to the promotion of the commercial interests of the nation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will make another complaint against the State of Maryland. Up to this time the State of Maryland and the State of Pennsylvania—for I make the complaint against both of them—have stood in the way of a railroad between Cleveland and Pittsburg and Washington city—a road that must some time or other and that ought to be speedily built—a road which if it had existed during the recent war would have saved this Government two or three million dollars. I speak within limits when I say that.

Mr. CRESWELL. Does the gentleman refer to the Connellsville road?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; that is part of the line. I know the Baltimore and Ohio railroad has been interested in completing it from Pittsburg to a connection with their road, and thence to Baltimore. Now, the people of the United States, and especially the people of the State that I represent, in which there is a great deal of feeling about this matter, desire the construction of a railroad from the capital of the Government through Pittsburg to the Northwest.

Mr. CRESWELL. I can only state to the gentleman that the State of Maryland, and I believe the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, are zealously aiding in that effort, and the fact is that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, although I have no authority to speak for that company, is actually engaged in the construction of a road from the city of Washington to the Point of Rocks.

Mr. JOHNSON. My colleague will permit me to state what they are doing, as perhaps I know it better than he does.

Mr. CRESWELL. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the city of Baltimore both are exceedingly anxious to have the Connellsville railroad completed. A charter was obtained from Pennsylvania for that purpose, and a charter from Maryland. The Maryland charter authorized the company chartered by Pennsylvania to come, to Cumberland, so as to connect with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. Owing to causes which it is unnecessary now to mention, Pennsylvania after having granted a charter to that company repealed it; repealed it upon the ground that the company had not complied with the conditions of the charter. There was some suspicion that the cause of that repeal was to prevent the trade coming to Baltimore. Whether that is true or not is immaterial. There is a suit now pending between the Connellsville Railroad Company and another company chartered by Pennsylvania, in which the validity of the repealing act is in issue. I tried a cause involving that question in the circuit court at Williamsport, Pennsylvania, during the last summer, and the judges there decided that that law was unconstitutional. The controversy is not yet settled. That question was upon a motion to dissolve an injunction. But since then I am glad to say to my friend from Ohio that under a charter granted by Maryland, the object of which is to bring the Baltimore and Ohio railroad more directly in connection with Washington than it is now by virtue of the existing road, a route has been surveyed from the Point of Rocks, coming through the neighboring county of Montgomery, and the company are about to commence that work at once, and I have very good reasons to believe that that road will be completed in a very short time, the effect of which will be to give a direct communication from the city of Washington to the West, which everybody must see is very desirable. Whether if such a communication had existed before two or three million dollars would have been saved to the Government is perhaps problematical, because the great expense and trouble to which the Government was put, and to which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company was subjected, was from the raids upon that road, and those raids would have applied just as well to a road continuously running from this District to the nearest point upon the Baltimore and Ohio railroad as upon the road as it existed.

My colleague will pardon me for adding a word further. The late lamented President of the United States and the present Secretary of War have over and over again told me, and they have communicated it officially to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, that the service rendered by that road to the United States during the rebellion was invaluable. It not only saved thousands and thousands of dollars, but it saved this capital. One of the feats which they achieved at the instance of the Government, and without which perhaps we might have been defeated at Richmond, was bringing forty thousand soldiers of General Sherman's army to the relief of the capital in order to join Grant's army. They brought the whole of them, I think, in two or three days, without losing a man or losing anything connected with that branch of the Army, even a cannon or anything else; and they were as speedily as possible sent to the front, by that means enabling General Grant with the force he before had to accomplish the victories which were so priceless in their results, and have thrown so much splendor upon his own name.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had not quite completed the charge that was made against Maryland. I do this not from any unfriendly feeling to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, which is one of the great arteries of the commerce of the West, but for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the complaints that prevail in my own State and throughout the whole Northwest in regard to the railroad system of Maryland. In regard to that little complaint about the baggage, I may say, although the Senator has not charge of the baggage, that I presume it has created more dissatisfaction with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company than all other things combined. It arises from the fact that every woman, child, or man who desires to go from here to the West, through Baltimore and Harrisburg, cannot get through the city of Baltimore with the ordinary facilities that are furnished in all other places that I know of in the United States. We cannot buy a ticket from here to go any way except one; and that little impediment of a mile between the end of one railroad and another in Baltimore is made more onerous and more troublesome than five hundred miles of railroad travel; and in some cases I have myself gone to Baltimore for the purpose of seeing ladies who were traveling to the West through that gap. Every Senator who travels to the West knows that he cannot get his trunk checked from here to Harrisburg, and so westward. It is one of those little annoyances which are very hard to bear, and I have been surprised again and again that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have not adopted the plan which is adopted in almost every city in the Union. You can go from here to Boston, through Philadelphia and New York, and check your baggage through; but you cannot get a ticket from Cleveland to Washington. You can to Baltimore, and then must get through Baltimore the best way you can, and perhaps have to hire a hack at considerable expense to get yourself and baggage through the city.

I desire to state another point if I do not interrupt my friend—

Mr. CRESWELL. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. The other complaint is that the State of Maryland has by some means or other by legislation prevented the completion of a road up the beautiful valley in which Hagerstown lies, so as to connect in that way with Harrisburg, and there is no means of communication between Washington and Harrisburg by way of Hagerstown.

Mr. JOHNSON. A road is being built there now.

Mr. SHERMAN. These are matters of complaint against the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and the State of Maryland, and they are generally grouped together because it is said that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad controls to some extent the legislation of Maryland. That it is so I do not vouch for; but these are complaints constantly made by the people of my State, who, as they lie right in the road of travel westward, feel these things more, perhaps, than any other State. I will say, in regard to Ohio, that our laws from the first have been extremely liberal; they allow anybody to build railroads anywhere in the State of Ohio who is willing to risk the investment. It seems to me that rule ought to be applied to all the States. As the Senator had alluded to the policy of his own State and to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, I deemed it but right and just to say that these complaints are general, and especially the first one, almost universal.

Mr. JOHNSON. If my colleague who is entitled to the floor will permit me a word, I will say that I do not know where the fault lies in regard to the absence of any arrangement about checking baggage and selling tickets through; but there has not been, unfortunately, an agreement between the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and the railroad that runs from the city of Baltimore to Harrisburg. General Cameron has been at the head of the latter company; and either with or without cause, I do not know which—I do not pretend to decide which is to blame, if either is to blame—there has been no accord between them. It is because of that difference that they have been unable to make an arrangement which it is necessary to make in order to check baggage through and give tickets through. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad, however, give tickets through everywhere except by way of Harrisburg.

Mr. CRESWELL. As the honorable Senator from Ohio has made certain inquiries in regard to the present and proposed action of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, I will state that I happen to have in my hand a speech of the president of that company made at the last annual meeting, which speech I think will afford the Senator all the information he may desire on the subject he has presented. If the Senator will pardon me, I will read some passages from this speech:

"Under the charter granted by the Legislature of Maryland at its last session, your engineers have been diligently engaged in locating a route from the Point of Rocks to Washington. I am gratified to inform you that they have so far progressed as to be able to state that the line from that point, which is now via the main stem and Relay House to Washington, ninety-one miles, will be reduced to forty-five miles, thus securing for the travel of the Southwest and the great West, a reduction in distance of forty-six miles.

"Notwithstanding the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Northern Central Railroad Company, whilst overflowing with professions to members of Congress and others regarding their anxiety for an improved line to the Capital; notwithstanding those parties have antagonized a further improvement of the highest utility and importance to the seat of Government, namely, the prosecution of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville road, from Connellsville to Cumberland, I am gratified to state that the United States district court have, in a decision heretofore rendered, distinctly maintained the rights of that company, under its charter, to construct the line.

"You all remember that the State of Pennsylvania granted the charter for this road; that fifty-eight miles of the road were constructed, and when the Baltimore and Ohio Company, recovering from its disasters and losses in the early part of the war, feeling it a duty, in the then situation of the country, prepared for the construction of that work, that the Hon. Thomas A. Scott, vice president of the Pennsylvania road, visited Harrisburg, and by his personal efforts and the influence of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as reliably stated, insisted upon that Legislature rescinding the charter of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville road for the unfinished portion of its line.

"But, gentlemen, the great requirements of the country, fully allied with the rights and equities of the case, will overwhelm and control the unjust efforts of parties who, in attempting to aggrandize other interests, improperly oppose those of the public.

"The Baltimore and Ohio Company and those associated with it are prepared to complete that short line to Pittsburgh, and thus by this improved route reduce the distance to Washington seventy-two miles from that central point in the West. While the relations to the national capital of the vast populations of the States of the Northwest are identified with this enterprise as well as their great agricultural interests, which would thus secure a route so much shorter and more economical to the sea-board, the city of Pittsburgh and western Pennsylvania are still more deeply and thoroughly interested in the prosecution of this work.

"Almost as one man, the merchants and manufacturers, the capitalists and the people of that city and of western Pennsylvania demand the construction of this road; and well they may, for with this line completed, and a direct outlet to Washington and Baltimore thus effected, the city of Pittsburgh has in its future a position scarcely secondary to Philadelphia itself. With its vast mineral resources and varied natural advantages, it is already the Birmingham of America; and with this double and powerful avenue thus opened for its people, a concentration of trade, and increase of manufacturing wealth and progress in all that makes communities great and prosperous, is before that city, of an unparalleled character."

He then proceeds to state the manner in which he proposes to secure the means necessary for that work:

"In this connection, it is proper to state that the distinguished gentlemen from England who recently visited this country in relation to American railway interests, were struck with the marked necessity as well as the great importance of this line; and that eminent, sagacious, and able gentleman, Sir S. Morton Peto, on behalf of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company, stated that in connection with the construction of the roads from Point of Rocks to Washington, and from Connellsville to Cumberland, capital would be promptly furnished and vigorous measures taken to complete the road from Cleveland, via Youngstown, to Pittsburgh, and thus furnish to members of Congress and all other parties visiting the capital of the United States, a route from Cleveland and the whole region of the lakes and Northwest, eighty-four miles shorter than any existing line."

I hope that is satisfactory to the Senator from Ohio on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said when I spoke before that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company favored the Connellsville road; but that was resisted by the Pennsylvania Central. The other road, though, from the Point of Rocks through Hagerstown to Harrisburg, is a point about which I think Mr. Garrett is not quite so satisfactory.

Mr. CRESWELL. I am not prepared to furnish the gentleman with information on that subject. I am not aware, however, of any hostility by the Legislature of Maryland to the construction of a railroad from Hagerstown to the Point of Rocks; and I know that a road is now being constructed from Hagerstown eastward to connect with the Baltimore and Ohio road, (at what point I am not prepared to say,) and that this connecting link, when completed, will afford to passengers from Harrisburg and the Cumberland valley an immediate outlet by way of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to Washington and Baltimore. That, I suppose, is the desideratum the gentleman speaks of.

There is only one other complaint, and that is in reference to baggage. Now, in regard to that, let me say that I will use my personal influence with the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company—I know it does not amount to much—and I am sure if the gentleman's trouble in that respect can be remedied it will be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator that he will in that way do thousands of men and a great many very estimable ladies a great benefit.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will turn my philanthropy in that direction and endeavor to benefit my own sex and make the ladies happy.

Mr. President, I have only a few words more to say, and I think the interruption of the Senator from Ohio perhaps gives me an opportunity to say them with a little more pertinency. The State of Maryland has a right to call upon the West, whose works of improvement she has aided to nurture by the most liberal donations of public lands, at least to abstain from any legislation which will prove inimical to her most important interests. As I stated just now and proved, Maryland has invested $36,000,000 of her own hard money in her works of internal improvement. Not one dollar for that purpose, so far as I am informed, has she ever received from the General Government.

To the States of the West, Maryland has voted with a generous heart large portions of that great domain which she long ago relinquished to the Union for the common good. It has been my policy since I have been in Congress to respond cordially to all the claims of the West; I am perfectly willing, if necessary, to give them a proper system of internal improvements; that they shall have every acre of the public lands. I am willing to aid them to the full extent of the Government. Weak no assistance from the Government; we merely ask that the Government will not subvert our own system and will not cause us to lose the immense amount of expenditure that we have already made for that purpose. We have already lost in our efforts to promote commerce between the other States of the Union and the internal commerce of Maryland one tenth of all the assessable property in the State. We have lost between twenty-seven and twenty-eight million dollars out of two hundred and eighty millions; and if the scheme of which I believe this bill is the forerunner is now adopted, and the Congress of the United States shall assume jurisdiction over all these railroad interests, it will result not only in the destruction of the roads which have been made already, but utterly to destroy the prospects of the State in the future.

Now, sir, what is the fact? In this country we are unable to build railroads by means of the capital of each separate locality. The Government does not purpose investing a thousand millions during the next ten years in railroads, as the States, and the enterprise of individuals assisted by the States, have done in the last ten years. The only security for all this money is found in the rights, franchises, and privileges conferred by State charters; and if Congress shall undertake by a new system of legislation to usurp the right of eminent domain over the States, and thereby make new grants of roads and canals to subvert the grants of the States, it will utterly destroy that confidence which is necessary to enable the people of the United States to gather capital for the construction of any additional roads in the future. I believe that this policy will not only be detrimental, but actually destructive, of the great interests of my State and country.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President—

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Maine desires to address the Senate at some length, I should judge from the indications; and I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that motion will not prevail. I desire to have a vote on this bill if it is possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot get it to-night.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] informed me a short time ago that he would not read all the books on his desk, and he can get through in half an hour.

Mr. GRIMES. If he only reads one half of them it will take a long time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall be glad to get a vote to-night.

Several SENATORS. You cannot get it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine informed me that he should be very brief in his remarks. I could make a long speech myself, but I will omit it, as I do not wish to occupy time.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Nevada told me that he desired to address the Senate. I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present, as I understand there is some other business which it is desirable to attend to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, returning to the Senate, in compliance with the request of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. POLAND. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, was passed. I was desired to state the reasons for moving this reconsideration. I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the subject, but merely to state in a word the ground on which I make the motion.

The amendment for which I voted, and which was offered by the Senator from Illinois, clearly recognizes, as I think on examination, the power of the President to make removals from office, and to fill them by appointing other persons. The amendment to this bill provides that in such cases, and where officers are removed for cause, their successors shall receive no pay. It seems to me that if we concede that the President has the right to make removals and to fill the vacancies thus occasioned by the appointment of other persons, so that they are legally invested with the office, it will not do for us to say that they shall not receive the compensation which the law provides. That is revolutionary; we might as well refuse to make an appropriation to pay the salary of the President if his action does not suit us.

Upon this question of the power of the President to remove officers, this vexed question, which has always been a vexed question, I do not propose to make any argument, because I do not propose to ask to have this matter considered now. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] informed us yesterday that he was preparing a bill upon the general subject of the power of removal from office. I desire that this motion to reconsider shall lie on the table until we may have his bill before us, and see whether it will not remove the difficulty. I submit the motion to reconsider, and ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senate adjourns, I ask that the motion to reconsider be made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] together with the bill to which it pertains—the Post Office appropriation bill—be postponed until Monday, at one o'clock, and made the special order then, so that we may dispose of it on that day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no objection to reconsidering it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope, then, that the motion will be now acted on, and then let the bill be postponed until Monday.

Mr. SUMNER, and others. Why not act now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the motion to reconsider the Post Office appropriation bill entered by the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the vote will be taken on the reconsideration, and then—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The reconsideration was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to and made the special order for Monday next, at one o'clock, unless the Senate is willing to dispose of it now. ["Yes."] I should like to have it disposed of now. ["No."]

Mr. JOHNSON. A great many Senators have left the Chamber. Nobody expected it to come up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. POLAND. I prefer it to lie until the bill proposed by the Senator from Missouri shall be brought in, and I understand from him that he proposes to offer the bill early in the coming week. I do not wish to name any fixed day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the consideration of the bill until Monday, and make it the special order for that day at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a privileged motion, to correct the Journal. I find in the proceedings of yesterday, as stated in the Globe, my name is recorded among those not voting on the Army bill. I voted against it.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McKEE. I rise to a personal explanation. I wish to state that on the vote yesterday on the Army bill I voted under a misapprehension. Some gentleman had made a motion to lay the bill on the table, and I supposed I was voting on that motion, and therefore I find myself recorded as voting for the bill. I intended to vote against it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. COOK, for three days, including yesterday.

Mr. TAYLOR asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY, for two weeks.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. MOORHEAD, for four days.

Mr. BINGHAM asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, for one week.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the first business in order this morning is the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote on the Army bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to allow me to modify the motion that I made yesterday. I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been rejected, and to lay that motion on the table. I did it with no unkind feeling toward the friends of the bill, but I think it requires a little more consideration, and with the permission of the House I will withdraw my motion to reconsider and move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, in justice to the chairman.

The SPEAKER. Before the bill can be recommitted the vote by which it was rejected must be reconsidered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. That leaves the motion to reconsider pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. My purpose in rising was to give notice that if the House should reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, I myself would move to recommit. I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to lay that motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CHANLER. I make it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The effect will be to kill that bill entirely.

The SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the motion to recommit should prevail I would also move to print the bill in the form in which it passed the House with the amendments.

Mr. CHANLER. It is not debatable.

The demand for the yeas and nays was not seconded.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, it was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now make the motion, or rather the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WRIGHT] has made the motion, to recommit. I suggest that he accompany the motion with another, that the bill as amended be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will make that motion also.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move to add instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the committee be instructed to report back an Army organization not exceeding thirty-five thousand men.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the motion to recommit and the motion to add instructions.

Mr. ROSS. I have now reduced my proposed instructions to writing, as follows:

That the committee be instructed to report a bill for an Army not to exceed thirty-five thousand men.

I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the proposition of the gentleman to reduce the Army to thirty-five thousand, if it were to prevail, would reduce the Army below its present maximum, forty-three thousand. I trust that there will be no instructions given to the committee. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; the question being first upon Mr. Ross's motion to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT. What would be the effect of moving to lay that motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would carry the bill with it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. Ross's motion, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs and order it printed; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitment.

EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution relative to the recent attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States of America has learned with deep regret the attempt made upon the life of the Emperor of Russia by an enemy of emancipation. The Congress send their greeting to his Imperial Majesty and to the Russian nation, and congratulate the twenty million souls upon the providential escape from danger of the sovereign to whose head and heart they owe the blessings of their freedom.

Mr. ROSS. I move to refer that resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to insert after the words "head and heart" in the resolution, the words "under God." The Emperor of Russia is the head of the Greek church and there ought to be some recognition of the divine power in this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. ROSS. I object unless it is to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the resolution until one man who is in favor of assassination cannot obstruct it.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. CHANLER. It is that the reasons of the gentleman for withdrawing the resolution were not stated so as to be heard here, and evidently had a bearing upon the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] objected to the introduction of the resolution, and that objection prevents the resolution coming in. The gentleman from New York was not recognized as objecting.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the committee on reconstruction, reported evidence in reference to the State of Georgia; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved that the same number of extra copies be printed as of the testimony heretofore reported by the same committee; which motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONKLING, from the same committee, reported testimony in relation to the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING moved that the same number of extra copies be printed as of the testimony heretofore reported by the same committee; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

COMMERCE WITH MEXICO.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House any information he may have concerning discriminations made by the so-called Maximilian government of Mexico against American commerce, or against commerce from particular American ports.

Mr. RAYMOND. I suggest to the gentleman that he call upon the President and not the Secretary of the Treasury for this information. That is the usual form, and I believe the only form in which the head of a Department can respond. I make that suggestion for his consideration.

Mr. JULIAN. I will modify the resolution in that way.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be allowed a clerk, at the usual compensation, for such length of time as the chairman may deem necessary, in order to make a careful investigation of the expenditures and administration of the Department of Agriculture.

MURDER OF NORTH CAROLINA UNION SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of April 16, 1866, the report of the Judge Advocate General in regard to the murder of certain Union soldiers belonging to the first and second North Carolina loyal infantry; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business for the morning hour of this day is the consideration of reports from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. O'NEILL. Does not the unfinished business of the Patent Office Committee come up this morning?

The SPEAKER. It does not; that business will come up when there is another morning hour for public business, when the Committee on Patents will be entitled to another morning hour. The morning hour of this day was assigned, by order of the House on the 18th of April, to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Territories.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, from the Committee on Territories, reported back House bill No. 202, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a territorial government for the Territory of Montana," approved May 26, 1864, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That the Governor of the Territory of Montana be, and he is hereby, authorized on and after the 1st day of September, 1866, to reapportion said Territory for the election of the Council and House of Representatives: Provided, That said apportionment shall be based on such an enumeration of the qualified electors of the several counties as shall appear from the election returns in the office of the secretary of the Territory and from such other sources of information as will enable the Governor, without taking a new census, to make an apportionment which shall fairly represent the people of the several counties in both Houses of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory; and the Legislative Assembly elected in pursuance of this act shall provide by law for the election of a Council and House of Representatives as directed in the act of which this act is an amendment.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the acts of the so-called Legislative Assembly elected without authority of law, and in pursuance of the proclamation of the acting Governor, which met and began its session in the city of Virginia on the 5th of March, 1866, be, and the same are hereby, declared disapproved and null and void; and no money now appropriated, or which may hereafter be appropriated, by the Congress of the United States for defraying the expenses of the territorial government of Montana, shall ever be paid to any person claiming to have been elected to the Council and House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory for services as members or officers thereof, at the session begun and held as aforesaid, or to defray the expenses incurred by said Legislative Assembly for any purpose.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken; and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNDARIES OF NEVADA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, from the Committee on Territories, reported back Senate bill No. 155, concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada, with an amendment.

The bill was read. The first section provides that, as provided for and consented to in the constitution of the State of Nevada, all that territory and tract of land adjoining the present eastern boundary of the State of Nevada, and lying between the thirty-seventh and the forty-second degrees of north latitude and west of the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west of Washington, shall be added to and made part of the State of Nevada.

The second section provides that there shall be added to and made a part of the State of Nevada all that extent of territory lying within the following boundaries, to wit: commencing on the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude, at the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington, and running thence south on said degree of longitude to the middle of the river Colorado of the West; thence down the middle of said river to the eastern boundary of the State of California; thence northwesterly along said boundary of California to the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; and thence east along said degree of latitude to the point of beginning; provided that the territory mentioned in this section shall not become a part of the State of Nevada until said State shall, through its Legislature, consent thereto.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the second section the following proviso: Provided further, That the possessory rights acquired by citizens of the United States, in mining claims discovered, located, and originally recorded in compliance with the rules and regulations adopted by miners in the Pah Ranagat and other mining districts in the territory incorporated by the provisions of this act into the State of Nevada, are hereby declared to be valid subsisting mining claims; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as granting a title in fee to any mineral lands held by possessory titles in the mining States and Territories.

Mr. KASSON. I would inquire if this act would make the titles to these mining claims any different from what they would be if this act should not pass.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. In the Territory of Utah, where it is supposed this Pah Ranagat district is situated, there is no law regarding mining claims. And if this bill should pass without the amendment proposed by the committee, as soon as the information should reach the district the mines now located there would be liable to have their claims jumped by persons who would at once enter them under the mining law of Nevada. And it is proposed that the possessory right to those claims shall remain the same as if they had been originally discovered in Nevada; but they are not thereby to have the title in fee.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely in the propriety of the object which it is desired to accomplish; but I fear that the manner in which it is proposed to be accomplished will interfere with any legislation that this Congress may determine upon touching the validity of those mining claims, unless the gentleman will consent to have the amendment so modified as to provide that the titles shall remain as valid as if this transfer of jurisdiction were not made. If the gentleman will consent that the amendment shall be put in that form, it will be safe; but it now declares that those titles shall be valid; and I fear that if the amendment be adopted in its present form, it may stand in the way of legislation which we may hereafter desire to enact.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman will examine the amendment, I think he will find that it is not justly liable to the objection which he raises. Both the Mining Committee and the Territorial Committee are unanimous in favor of the adoption of this proposition.

Mr. KASSON. Let the amendment be again read.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The point which I make is that instead of the language, "are hereby declared to be valid," the amendment should read, "shall remain as valid and subsisting as if this act had not been passed." By the language which I propose, we shall avoid precluding ourselves from making any modification as to the extent of the claims, if we should choose to attempt hereafter a general system of regulating these mining claims.

I may remark that I take some special interest in this question in consequence of examinations made during my trip to the mountains last year. The amendment which I propose will accomplish, as I think the gentleman must admit, the entire purpose which he has in view, while it will avoid the danger that I certainly for one apprehend from the present language of the amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no objection to the amendment which the gentleman suggests. The Mining committee, of which I am a member, as well as the Territorial Committee, have had this matter under consideration, and are unanimous in favor of amending the bill in this way in order to secure the interests of parties who have made large outlays. I have no objection to the insertion of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. KASSON's amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out before the word "valid" the words "are hereby declared to be," and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall remain as."

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to ask whether our action in declaring possessory rights valid is to affect the legal title to those lands.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. We desire to negative entirely the idea that it shall have any such effect.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. This is a question affecting the Territory which I represent here; and from the reading of the bill I have not been able to trace distinctly the line of division proposed. I therefore ask the chairman of the committee to state to what extent the committee propose to dismember the Territory of Utah.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. They propose to take off eighteen thousand square miles.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give to me in degrees? Is it one degree east and west?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Moving the boundary from the thirty-eighth to the thirty-seventh degree?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir; taking eighteen thousand square miles, leaving the Territory of Utah with eighty-eight thousand square miles, whereas it now has one hundred and six thousand.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me to move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until it shall have been printed?

The SPEAKER. It would be, if the gentleman from Ohio yields for that purpose.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not yield for that purpose. This is a Senate bill; it has been printed in the Senate, and is now on our files.

I cannot consent to such a motion as the gentleman proposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] the chairman of the Committee on Territories, ought not to urge this matter against the wishes of the Delegate from Utah without giving him a fair hearing. This bill proposes to take off eighteen thousand square miles from that Territory; and I think it only fair and just that the Delegate representing the Territory should have a full opportunity to be heard on this question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the previous question on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. KASSON's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now yield to my colleague from Maine [Mr. RICE] to offer a further amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. By instruction of the committee, I move to amend by striking out the following words:

To the middle of the river Colorado of the West; thence down the middle of said river to the eastern boundary of the State of California; thence northwesterly along said boundary of California to the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; and thence east along said degree of latitude to the point of beginning.

Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that the effect of that amendment is to exclude from the portion of the territory to be attached to Nevada that portion in the Territory of Arizona, so that all the territory annexed to Nevada by this bill will only be the portion taken from Utah.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I ask the gentleman to consent to the printing of this bill before action is taken on it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It has already been printed and is upon our files. I yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes of the hour to which I am entitled under the rules.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a speech, but I feel it due to my constituents to elicit for them as much information as I can why this dismemberment should take place.

From the reading of the report of the House committee, as well as from the report of the Senate committee, upon which that body has acted and passed this bill, I have not been able to find any tangible reason assigned, indeed any reason at all, for the course which is attempted to be pursued. The bill presented to the Senate, as I understand, was drafted by one of the Senators from Nevada. It was there referred to the Committee on Territories, and I believe specially referred to him, and by him reported favorably to the Senate, when the Senate, acting in accordance with the report, passed it.

I will say that during the pendency of this matter in the Senate I never received any notice, nor did I have any opportunity of appearing before that committee to represent the views of the citizens of Utah touching this matter which so vitally affects their interests. I have had an opportunity of appearing before the House committee, and there stated my objections to this matter.

It is not, Mr. Speaker, only in behalf of the people of Utah that I object to the dismemberment proposed, but to the principle that is to be established. I believe the course of legislation now proposed is without precedent in the history of the country or its legislation in reference to the Territories. On the simple action of a committee thousands of square miles are taken from one Territory and attached to another without assigning a reason or consulting the people who are to be transferred. It does appear to me a position of this kind, transferring land from one Territory to another, with the inhabitants thereof, is reducing these people, and nothing more nor less, to the condition of serfs; and in behalf of my constituents, the people of Utah, I here most solemnly protest against it.

According to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE,] that part of the bill which proposes to dismember Arizona is in mercy stricken out.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The amendment has not been adopted.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. On the principle of equal legislation the amendment should cover the whole ground.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then there would be no bill.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. There ought not to be. I deem it almost next to useless to refer to the fact that the people of Utah were the first to break a path from the Missouri river to the center of this continent. We claim to be the pioneers. We claim to have taken the germ of everything now in that country, over the broken roads and there planted them without any expense to the Government. We have there built up a State of one hundred and fifty thousand people; we have built up two hundred and fifty grist and saw mills; we have established three cotton factories; we have grown two thousand bales of cotton; we have opened up one hundred and fifty thousand acres of arable land, from which not only that State but all the Territories adjacent draw their supplies.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I must resume the floor.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I ask the House, in the name of justice, and in respect to the rights of a people who have done as much as any other to sustain the Government, to reject the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I yield ten minutes to the Delegate from Arizona.

Mr. GOODWIN. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will prevail. The bill, as amended, would provide for taking a portion of Utah and annexing it to Nevada, striking out so much of the Senate bill as provided for the annexation of any portion of Arizona.

This bill came to the House of Representatives from the Senate. While it was pending before the Committee on Territories in the Senate no hearing was had on the merits of this question. With my consent no hearing was had at that time, though I was notified that the bill was pending, for the reason that I desired to hear from my constituents in relation to the matter. When the bill came before the Committee on Territories of the House a full hearing was had on the merits of the question, and the committee, after hearing, decided to strike out so much of the bill as related to the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives is not the most convenient tribunal before which to present a question of this kind. A question regarding the dismemberment of a Territory should be decided upon evidence and facts, and not upon simple statements made in the course of debate; and the question was so regarded by the Committee on Territories of this House. I hope that the House will adopt the recommendation of the committee on this subject.

I can only state very briefly, in the time allotted to me this morning, the substance of the argument, the points that were made before the Committee on Territories. It would be impossible to go over the argument in full.

The first objection to taking this portion of the Territory of Arizona and annexing it to Nevada is this: there is no natural connection between those Territories. This portion of the Territory of Arizona is part of the watershed of the Colorado river. All the streams running through that Territory empty into the Colorado. The people receive their supplies up the Colorado river. The principal mail route into Arizona runs down through a settlement about two hundred miles distant from Prescott, which is the capital of the Territory. All their connections and business are with the Territory of Arizona.

Now, if they were annexed to the State of Nevada they would be obliged, in order to reach the capital of the Territory, either to go round by San Francisco or to go up nearly to the point of the overland mail route before they could get into the route leading to the capital of Nevada. There is no natural connection between this country and the State of Nevada. It is separated from that State by a portion of the great desert, which presents an almost impassable barrier. It is so perfectly barren that it is called "Death Barren." That forms the boundary between the two.

There is another objection to this bill. It establishes a new precedent in legislation. While the consent of the State of Nevada is made a condition precedent to the annexation of this Territory, no consent is required on the part of the people of Arizona. They are obliged to take upon themselves the burden of a State government without their consent. I would be perfectly willing that this bill should pass if the people of that portion of Arizona can be permitted to vote on this question and decide it by a majority. And I propose to offer, if this amendment should not be adopted and the bill should pass in its present shape, an amendment of that kind. And sir, I know, and gentlemen who advocate this bill know, that if the bill does pass in this shape there will be an almost unanimous vote of the people of that portion of the Territory against it.

It may be urged that there are but few people within this Territory. Last year there were fifteen hundred people at least upon the Muddy river and its branches, and I am informed by the Governor of Arizona, Mr. McCormick, that there are now nearly twenty-five hundred people within the Territory, and that by the middle of this summer there will be five thousand.

The burden of a State government is sought to be imposed upon these people without asking in any way their consent, and I believe that is establishing a wrong precedent.

Mr. GRINNELL. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] I desire to say that I have a friend living upon this portion of the Territory proposed to be set off, and if we are to yield to the vote of the people whether it shall be annexed to Nevada, I see no objection whatever, inasmuch as Utah has a much larger portion of arable territory. At present I do not believe it is as well governed as Nevada, but if we are going to yield to the people, to common sense, and to the laws of nature, they would go there; and if eighty thousand square miles is not enough for Utah, as it is at present constituted, I think we had better take off a little on the north. I hope we will by all means give Nevada a slice, thus securing more arable land to that State which is well governed and is now yielding a very large revenue to the Government.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman from Nevada, who is more interested in this matter than any other member of the House. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Utah, [Mr. HOOPER,] that when I was on a visit last summer through his Territory, President Young told me he had no objection whatever to this proposed dismemberment of the Territory of Utah. There are but few, if any, of his people living upon the territory proposed to be transferred.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know who President Young is?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Brigham Young is president of the church.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh!

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I favor this measure and am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, because the bill equalizes the Territories and makes the area of Nevada, which is now but 80,000 square miles, by the additions taken from Utah and Arizona, 104,000 square miles; Colorado has 104,000 square miles; New Mexico has 121,000 square miles; and with the dismemberment which we propose from Arizona, we still leave that Territory 121,000 square miles. Thus the territorial area of Nevada will be 104,000 square miles, Utah 88,000, Arizona 121,000, New Mexico 121,000, and Colorado 104,000.

In addition to that, the annexation of this territory to Nevada makes the boundary line of that State a navigable river. The head waters of navigation will then be within the State of Nevada; they will have an outlet to the Gulf and to the sea; and as they have less arable land susceptible of cultivation than either Arizona or Utah, I think it due that we should annex this territory to the State of Nevada.

I will state that at the time the Territory of Nevada was erected, but few of the members of the Committee on Territories understood anything of that country; it was comparatively unknown; we only knew it as a mining country. Since that time I myself have been through the Territory of Utah and the State of Nevada, coming back by the southern route; and I think I understand the wants of the people of that country; and I am sure the Speaker also understands them. I hope, therefore, that the proposition made by the Senate and sent in here will be adopted, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. RICE] will be voted down.

I now yield, for a moment, to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. Before the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor, I desire to ask him a question. I would ask him whether he thinks that, from a trip across the country, he knows more about that country and the wants of its people than a man who has lived there for sixteen years.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not know that a man could pick up the same amount of information in the time I was there that a man could pick up in fifteen or sixteen years; but I know that the information I obtained was from reliable gentlemen, and that I am quite as disinterested in this matter as the gentleman can be who represents the Territory of Utah. I now yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, it was for a long time understood in Nevada that we had this territory that it is proposed now to take from Utah. Some of the maps showed it; a map which the Delegate from Arizona had here showed it. But the law turned out to be different.

The reason why we want this territory for Nevada is that our people from Nevada have discovered mines in that degree of latitude, and we are occupying the country now. I live in the eastern part of Nevada myself, and I know of but one Mormon living in that degree of latitude. The Mormons have always been averse to mining; they have crushed it out in that Territory, and I can tell this Congress that our people who discover and work mines there do not wish to be under the control of the government of Utah; and I tell you that it is for the benefit of the United States that they should not be. All of Nevada was made out of the Territory of Utah. They opposed the organization of the Territory of Nevada in the beginning.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I believe that when the Territory of Nevada was organized I was the Delegate from Utah, and so far from opposing the measure, I acquiesced in it. And let me repeat here that it is merely as a matter of principle that I object to this measure.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. The Territory of Nevada was here three years before she could be admitted. And if Utah was in favor of it, as well as the people of Nevada, it is a little strange it took so long to get her in.

Now, our people are occupying this strip of territory, which Utah does not need and which we do. The State of Nevada has not to exceed fifty thousand inhabitants, while the returns of the collector of internal revenue show that she pays a tax of $286,000. Utah has a population of eighty thousand, and pays but $41,000 tax. The people of Nevada pay taxes at the rate of $5 70 each; the people of Utah at the rate of fifty-one cents each, or about one eleventh as much as the people of Nevada. Let members judge which is the most benefit to the United States.

The gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOOPER] speaks of the principle of the thing. I should like to know what principle is violated by this bill, when the organic act of Utah provides for reserving to the Congress the right to take a portion of the territory to be annexed to some other State or Territory. And that is the case in regard to the organic act of Arizona. The Territory of Utah has twenty-five thousand square miles more than Nevada has, and the district proposed to be annexed to Nevada is a mining territory. The people of Nevada are a mining people, while the people of Utah are an agricultural people. We need this strip of territory; our interests are identical with the interests of those who inhabit that strip of territory. Utah will then be left with eighty-eight thousand square miles, which is seven thousand square miles more than Nevada now has.

In regard to Arizona, I will say that there is a point of land across the Colorado river, running up between Nevada and California, of about six thousand square miles. It has been very little occupied until lately. Since navigation has been opened, a few persons from Utah have gone down there and settled at the head of navigation on the western side of the Colorado river. They are opposed to being united with Nevada, because they will then be under a State government, and not under a territorial government, where they might have more influence.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I must resume the floor now, and ask for a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE.]

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and having been read the third time, it was passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, from the Committee on Territories, reported back, without amendment, House bill No. 179, amendatory of the organic act of Washington Territory, approved March 2, 1853.

The bill was read. The first section provides that after the next annual session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington the sessions shall be biennial; members of the Council shall be elected for a term of four years, and members of the House for a term of two years, and shall receive the sum of six dollars per day instead of three dollars, as heretofore allowed, and the same mileage now allowed by law.

The second section provides that each House shall have authority to elect, in addition to the officers now allowed by law, an enrolling clerk, who shall receive five dollars per day; the chief clerk shall receive six dollars per day, and the other officers elected by said Legislature shall receive five dollars each per day.

The third section provides that the first election for the first biennial session under this act shall be held at the time of holding the general election for the Territory in 1867.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARTESIAN WELLS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, from the Committee on Territories, reported back, with an amendment, House joint resolution No. 32, to facilitate communication with certain Territories.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read the third time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that whenever any loyal citizen of the United States shall make and establish an artesian well on the line of any mail route in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado, and the Colorado desert of California, at least ten miles distant from any spring or stream of living water upon such route, and a like distance from any well which may be established thereon by virtue hereof, he shall be entitled to one section of the public land, not including mineral land, embracing such well, the same to be marked out and designated in a compact form by such citizen; and upon filing with the surveyor general a sworn notice of the fact that such well has been established, with a particular description of the premises so marked out and designated, the same shall be treated as reserved land, and after the lapse of three years from the date of such establishment and upon satisfactory proof made to the said surveyor general of conformity to the foregoing stipulations, and that pure water from such well has been constantly furnished without charge to the public traveling upon such route, the incentive right of the claimant shall be affirmed, and upon the extension of the lines of the public survey, the boundaries of such section shall be adjusted according to the lines thereof.

The second section provides that effect shall be given this resolution by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who shall have full power to revise and finally determine all rights and claims arising under the same, and to furnish evidence of title to such reserves, by patent or otherwise, with such conditions incorporated therein as may be necessary to secure and perpetuate the purposes of the grant; provided that no more than six hundred and forty acres shall be granted in the case of any one well; and provided further, that no grantee or beneficiary under this act shall be allowed to enter any lands under any homestead act of the United States.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. GOODWIN, who moved to amend by inserting after the word "well," in the fourth line, the words "at places where water cannot be procured by other means;" so that the clause would read:

Whenever any loyal citizen of the United States shall make and establish an artesian well at places where water cannot be procured by other means.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire whether this is the bill we had before us some time ago proposing to give a square mile of land to any man who digs a well.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. No, sir; by the amendment which has just been proposed, it is provided that these grants shall not be made, except in cases where water cannot be procured by other means.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman would reduce the quantity, so as to give only a quarter section or one hundred and sixty acres in each case, I do not know that I would object to the bill. As it is, I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Rice] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I demand the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am very certain that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not desire to have this bill laid on the table had he ever traveled over those plains. I undertake to say that in this immense region, east of the Sierra Nevada mountains, there is not one acre in ten thousand that can be used for agricultural purposes without irrigation; and in all that country there is not in any living stream or lake sufficient water to irrigate one acre in every ten thousand. The only hope of redeeming this land is in having these artesian wells dug, in order that the lands there may have irrigation.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman expect that irrigation for agricultural purposes will be furnished by artesian wells?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is the only hope.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it any hope at all?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not know whether sufficient water can ever be obtained in this way; but I do know that some of the finest regions in the Old World have been opened to cultivation by means of the irrigation furnished by artesian wells; and I know that in this vast country, ranging from Mexico to the northern Pacific, there is not one acre in ten thousand which can ever be brought under cultivation unless by the aid of artesian wells.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to state, in connection with this question, that in San José valley, in the State of California, there are several artesian wells which have been sunk to a great depth, and which give an abundant flow of water. And in the city of Stockton, in the county of San Joaquin, an artesian well has been sunk to the depth of nine hundred or a thousand feet, giving a stream of water which rises twelve or fifteen feet above the surface.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I resume the floor to demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the House will refuse to second the demand for the previous question. I desire to know from the gentleman from Maine whether, under existing law, there is not provision by which title to a portion of the land on this mail route can be obtained from the Government.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand there is. I can get the book in a minute. They are entitled to preëemption.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Under the homestead bill they may be.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

On seconding the previous question there were, on a division—ayes 67, noes 35.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask that the Committee on Territories shall have another morning hour after the call of the select committees. When the committee was called before I was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

AMENDMENT OF TERRITORIAL ACTS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, from the Committee on Territories, reported back House bill No. 508, to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico.

During the reading of the bill the morning hour expired, and the bill went over until the next morning hour for public business.

COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES—AGAIN.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask that the Committee on Territories shall have a morning hour on Saturday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. I do not object to the committee having a morning hour after the usual morning hour.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I object.
Mr. STEVENS. I suggest that Saturday week be set apart to receive reports from all the committees. We can never get through unless that be done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. An hour for each committee.

Mr. ROSS. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

The SPEAKER accordingly laid before the House Senate bill No. 74, for the admission of Colorado into the Union; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am instructed to put this bill on its passage, unless some gentleman desires to be heard on it, or an early day can be fixed for its consideration.

Several MEMBERS. Let us act on it now.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. If I understand the action of the Committee on Territories, it was that a day should be assigned for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If no one desired to be heard I was to put it on its passage.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (S. No. 26) entitled "An act to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas."

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, that the President had approved sundry acts that originated in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, House bill No. 280 was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 220, for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to have it read. It involves the payment of millions of dollars for the benefit of contractors.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for all that.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO—AGAIN.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Unless some gentleman desires to offer an amendment, or unless I can have an early day fixed for the consideration of this bill, I shall ask the previous question.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Will the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I desire to strike out the word "white" where it occurs.

Several MEMBERS. It is not in the bill.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I did not understand that this was to come up for discussion to-day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the reporting of this bill.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Is it not in order to move to refer it to the committee?

The SPEAKER. It is if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] withdraws his demand for the previous question; not otherwise.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better allow a day or two for some friends to amend this bill. There are reasons why a great many of us cannot now vote for it, but we may amend it so as to pass it. I hope the gentleman will consider whether it is prudent to take the sense of the House upon it now.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for that purpose unless we fix, say to-morrow after the morning hour, for its consideration.

Mr. ROSS. I think we had better have it postponed, say to-morrow two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I insist on the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 45, noes 57.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and LeBLOND. The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 68.

So the previous question was not seconded. Mr. RICE, of Maine. I now move to refer it to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope it will not be committed unless the House is disposed to reject it entirely. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I desire myself that some day may be assigned for the consideration of this important question, and I hope it may be an early day. I do not wish to send this to the committee if it can be avoided, but rather than be driven to a vote upon it to-day, I shall insist that it go to the committee. But I trust the chairman of the committee will name an early day for the consideration of this bill. There are great principles involved in it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will name Monday, after the morning hour.

Mr. ROSS. I call for the special order.

The SPEAKER. This is before the House now, by its order to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ROSS. Can I ask for the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can demand it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What is the special order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are two special orders in the House, made some time since, operating after the expiration of the morning hour, one to establish the grade of general in the Army and the other in regard to the pay of officers of the Army, both coming from the Committee on Military Affairs. On Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the constitutional amendment reported from the committee on reconstruction is made the special order. On Wednesday and Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the two bills reported by that committee are also made special orders to continue until disposed of. Besides that, there is the tax bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, which has been made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for next Monday, after the morning hour.

That is the condition of the business of the House with regard to special orders.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I ask that this bill be assigned for next Monday, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The special orders now made can only be overridden by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I shall object, if it is to interfere with other special orders.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If it should be made a special order for Monday, could it not be postponed by a vote of a majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. It can.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Very well; then I cannot see why the House should not consent to let it be made the special order for Monday, and then, if a majority of the House prefers to take up the tax bill, they can postpone this measure and take that up. The matter will be within the control of a majority of the House. It seems to me that to refer this bill to the Committee on Territories would be to kill it.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what is intended.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that that is what is intended, but I do not desire to see it killed. If any gentlemen here have opposition to make to this bill, I am willing that they shall have a fair opportunity of presenting their views to the House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I make the proposition that we go on with the bill now, and if gentlemen have anything to say, or have any amendments to offer, do it now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I demand the previous question on that motion.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to hear that bill read before we are called to vote upon it.

The bill was read.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I make that motion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Before the vote is taken, I ask the Chair to state the question to the House distinctly, so that it may be understood.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Which would kill the bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 109, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Blaine, Boyer, Chanler, Coffroth, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, LeBlond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Pike, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, Winfield, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, De-frees, Deming, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—109.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bidwell, Cook, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Eggleston, Glossbrenner, Good-year, Hale, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, Nicholson, Noel, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, William B. Washburn, and Wentworth—45.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CHANLER said: My colleague, Mr. JAMES M. HUMPHREY, has paired off with Mr. POMEROY.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that if the previous question is seconded and the main question ordered, and the motion to refer is then voted down, the previous question would not be exhausted until the bill has passed its third reading.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. RICE] will withdraw his call for the previous question and let the question be taken upon the motion to refer, and I hope the motion to refer will not prevail, but that we will go on with the consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. RICE, of Maine, to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 53, noes 56.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 74, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Baxter, Bergen, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Chandler, Conkling, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Henderson, Higby, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Jenckes, Julian, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, LeBlond, Marshall, McCullough, McRuer, Morrill, Morris, Newell, Niblack, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, De-frees, Deming, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Plants, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spalding, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Cook, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Donnelly, Eggleston, Goodyear, Hale, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, Nicholson, Noel, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Taber, Thayer, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, William B. Washburn, and Wentworth—45.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now propose that this bill be considered in the House. If any gentleman desires to be heard upon it I will yield a part of my hour to him.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is very liberal, seeing that the previous question has been refused him.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, I have the floor now.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] makes a speech, I suppose we can answer it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. On the 24th March, 1864, the Congress of the United States passed an enabling act authorizing the people of the Territory of Colorado to form a constitution and State government prior to their admission into the Union. Enabling acts were also passed for the Territories of Nebraska and Nevada. I drew up those enabling acts and introduced them into this House; but finding that the Committee on Territories would not be reached in time for action on them in the Senate during the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, I carried them to the Senate and had them introduced there, and they passed that body; but this House failed to pass them at that session. At the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress the same bills or enabling acts were again introduced into both the Senate and House, and became laws. The bill authorizing the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government became a law, as I have said, on the 24th of March, 1864.

My object in drafting and urging the passage of those enabling acts was twofold: one to establish a new principle in the admission of States into this Union, negating, so far as I could in the enabling acts, the old idea of State rights; the other to secure the vote of three more States, in case the election of President and Vice President in the year 1864 should come to the House of Representatives.

At the time those enabling acts were passed it was not thought expedient by the party to which I belong to prescribe the qualification of electors in the constitutions of the States which were authorized to be organized and admitted into the Union. The people of Colorado, in the constitution which they formed in pursuance of that enabling act, and which constitution they rejected, prescribed that none but white persons should be electors within the State. The State of Nevada, having accepted the conditions prescribed by Congress, was admitted into the Union, with a provision in her constitution precisely like the one now objected to in the constitution of Colorado. At that time the people of Colorado voted against the proposition to become a State.

But last year the people of Colorado of all parties called upon the several committees representing the State and the anti-State organizations, and also the Democratic organization, and asked them to make an independent move for a State organization. While I was in the Territory they agreed upon a plan for electing delegates to a constitutional convention. In pursuance of the joint calls of those committees elections were held in that Territory, and a convention assembled which adopted a constitution in strict compliance with the provisions of the enabling act. That constitution was submitted to the people of Colorado, and by them adopted.

Mr. FINCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to ask my colleague what was the total number of votes at the election to which he refers.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. According to a pamphlet which I hold in my hand, 7,166 was the total vote.

Mr. FINCK. Can my colleague advise the House what is the present population of Colorado?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I had here a statement from the Legislature of Colorado, estimating the present population of the Territory at fifty thousand.

Mr. FINCK. Can my colleague refer to any census taken in that Territory?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir, I cannot. The total vote at the recent election for Congressman was 7,557. If the gentleman will refer to the election returns for the eastern or southern States, he will find that this is a larger number of votes than is cast in several of the Representative districts in a number of the southern States. It is a larger vote than that cast in the State of Delaware or the State of Florida.

Mr. FINCK. Let me ask my colleague whether the number of voters in the Territories is not greater in proportion to the population than in the States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As a rule, Mr. Speaker, that is true of all newly settled Territories. But Colorado has been a Territory for some years. I have myself visited the Territory twice—once three years ago last fall, and again this year—and I can state that the female population is largely increasing, as also the junior population; so that the disparity between the actual population of a congressional district in one of the eastern or southern States and that of Colorado is not so great as my colleague would have the House suppose.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he is not aware that according to the returns made by the Post Office Department, which furnish a good test of population, the number of letters distributed in that Territory has within the last few years been largely and constantly decreasing.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is at all conversant with the troubles incident to the Indian depredations upon the plains, he is aware that last year a large portion of the population of the Territory of Colorado left there for the eastern States and for other Territories of the West, and that the line of communication was constantly broken, at one time for several weeks, in consequence of the Indian depredations, so that the mails for weeks at a time were not carried to all parts of the Territory. Hence the test which the gentleman seeks to introduce is not a fair one. I take it, sir, that the voting population is a better and fairer test; and I believe that the number of voters at the last election in that Territory shows a population equal to that of some districts in the eastern States that now have Representatives in Congress, and we all know that they have a larger voting population than many congressional districts in the southern States.

Mr. ROSS. As the gentleman has visited that Territory, I ask him to state what, in his judgment, is the population of that Territory, leaving out those who are merely temporarily there for the purpose of mining.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to state, because I was not in the southern part of the Territory which is inhabited by the Mexican population. But I was in all the mining districts, and from the best information which I could obtain, I think the population was more than forty thousand. But it is constantly increasing. The population of Colorado is to-day twice as great as that of the State of Florida at the time of its admission. Its population is greater than that of the State of Arkansas when it was admitted, or the State of Oregon at the time of its admission.

Mr. FINCK. Let me suggest to my friend that when those States were admitted the ratio of representation was much less than at present.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. That is true. But, sir, the number of votes is the best test; and if there are on an average as many voters for the State ticket or for members of Congress as are cast in other districts having Representatives, the gentleman should not interpose that objection. I addition to this, we all know how much faster the mining States and Territories increase in population than the agricultural States. Colorado furnished three regiments for the war, has furnished a large emigration to Montana, Idaho, and other mining Territories, and yet her population is steadily and surely increasing, and I do not hesitate to predict that by the census of 1870 she will have a population of two hundred thousand people. So far as population is concerned, however, Congress having proposed to these people to become a State, I think, without violating any great principle, we ought to vote for their admission. I desire also to vote for their admission because I believe in the principle of organizing State governments at the earliest day practicable in every one of the Territories.

Mr. ROSS. Is it not objectionable in excluding negroes from suffrage?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am compelled to vote for many propositions objectionable to me as an individual. I expect to vote for the report of the committee of fifteen.

Mr. ROSS. Why?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Because it ignores the great body of loyal men in the South who during the rebellion were our friends and fought to preserve the Union, while it practically leaves the government of the late rebel States in the hands of those who attempted to destroy this nation. I intend to go for it, however, because I believe it is the best proposition we can get, and because it reflects the aggregate sentiment of the country. By passing this bill we but affirm the principle of that report. We leave the question of suffrage to the people of Colorado, and I would rather intrust that question or any other to the loyal people of Colorado, who furnished three regiments of as good soldiers as ever entered the Union Army, than to commit the question of enfranchising the black man to the white electors of the late rebel States, as we propose to do in the proposition submitted by the joint committee of fifteen. I have no doubt that the loyal people of Colorado will enfranchise her blacks long before the blacks are enfranchised by the spirits who will control the late rebel States, if the proposition of the committee becomes law.

But I do not want to take up the time of the House in the discussion of this question, and therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. CHAVES. I ask to present the following amendment:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said State of Colorado shall consist of all the Territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-eighth degree of north latitude with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; extending thence due west along said thirty-eighth degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-second degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due north along said thirty-second degree of west longitude to a point formed by its intersection with the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence due east along said forty-first degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south along said twenty-fifth degree of west longitude.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield for that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to the following amendment:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the said State of Colorado shall so amend the constitution thereof as to strike out the word "white" as a qualification of voting.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will let that amendment in and then call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 95, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Hotchkiss, Ashah, W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kelso, Loan, Lynch, McCall, McRuer, Morrill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Stevens, Elihu B. Washburn, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boyer, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Darling, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Plants, Raymond, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Townbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—95.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook Culver, Davis, Dawes, Dodge, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Hale, Hayes, Hibby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pomerooy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Taber, Thayer, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Stephen F. Wilson—51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 57, not voting 45—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Deffrees, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Ashah W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Laflin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Welker, Whaley, and Williams—81.

NAVY—Messrs. Allison, Alley, Ancona, Baxter, Bergen, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Broome, Chandler, Croft, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Higby, James Humphrey, Julian, Kelley, Kuykendall, LeBond, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, McRuer, Morrill, Morris, Newell, Niblack, Paine, Perham, Pike, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Cook, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Hale, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin H. Hubbell, Hulbert, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marvin, McIndoe, Nicholson, Noel, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Stephen F. Wilson—45.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. J. L. THOMAS said: I have paired with my colleague, Mr. PHELPS, who would have voted against the bill. I would have voted for it.

Mr. WINFIELD. My colleague, Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY, has paired with my colleague, Mr. POMEROY.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, requesting the return of the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that it be returned.

The SPEAKER. It has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it will be necessary to reconsider that reference. If there be no objection it will be regarded as reconsidered, and the order will be made by the House to return the bill to the Senate in compliance with the request.

WILLIAM COOK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 277, for the relief of William Cook; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. MARVIN, who has been called away by the death of a brother.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. EDWARD COOPER, his Private Secretary; which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d ultimo, I transmit a report from the Secretary of War, from which it will be perceived that it is not deemed compatible with the public interests to communicate to the House the report made by General Smith and Hon. James T. Brady, of their investigations at New Orleans, Louisiana.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1866.

COLLECTION OF PLANTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was joint resolution of the Senate No. 76, providing for the acceptance of a collection of plants tendered to the United States by Frederick Peck; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 220, for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by referring it to the Committee of Claims.

The amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was also agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES OVER THE MISSISSIPPI.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 236, to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KASSON. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I ask, at the same time, to offer this amendment and have it take the same reference:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any railroad corporation, whose road has been completed to the Mississippi river, and connects with a railroad on the opposite side thereof, having first obtained authority therefor from the States of Illinois and Iowa, to construct a railroad bridge across said river upon the same terms, in the same manner, under the same restrictions, and with the same privileges as is provided for in this act in relation to the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that, as this is a bill providing for one bridge and the amendment proposed is for another, the amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair finds from a hasty examination of the bill that it provides for three bridges across the Mississippi river, and the Chair thinks that this amendment is germane.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer another amendment to the bill, in order that it may go with the bill when it is referred.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it be read, and then we can see whether we object or not.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And that the Keokuk and Hamilton Mississippi Bridge Company be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a bridge over the Mississippi river at Keokuk, Iowa, of the same description as the other bridges provided for by this act.

There being no objection, the amendment was received.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. While I am in favor of these amendments, and will vote for them on the proper occasion, I am opposed to gentlemen coming in here now and riding down a bill which has been maturely considered in the Senate by the friends of the bridges at Quincy and Burlington. This measure was considered in the Senate by a very able committee, and a basis was laid by them upon which the Senate and the House can act intelligently. I do object to having that bill laid aside in some committee in order to give these gentlemen an opportunity to provide a substitute for it.

It will be a very easy thing for them to bring in their bills and pass them after the principle of bridging the Mississippi river shall have been established by the passage of this bill. While I am as much in favor of the gentleman's proposition as he is, I do hope his course will not be approved by the House.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] raises a new question. He proposes that the House shall pass upon this bill without reference to a committee at all. If that is the general desire of the House I am willing that they shall take it up in connection with the amendment for action now.

But, sir, the gentleman is certainly wrong in saying that the object is to "ride down" this measure of which he is the friend. He forgets that forty miles north of his own city there is a city in Iowa of equal importance, with roads approaching it on both sides, and with what Quincy has not, a solid rock bottom in the river, which we have already appropriated money to blast out, so as to let boats through.

Now, I say, that when the proposition is to construct a bridge at a point like that, made by nature for it, the gentleman should not say that the intention is to "ride down" the bill. On the contrary, that amendment will strengthen his measure.

A word more. The gentleman has spoken of establishing the principle of bridging the Mississippi river. Why, sir, that principle has been established already, and there are two bridges now constructed above the points at which this bill authorizes the construction of bridges.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, and which obstruct navigation to the amount of millions of dollars a year.

Mr. KASSON. I would be much obliged if my friend from Illinois would allow me to speak when I have the floor, and when I am through I will yield with pleasure to him.

I say that the principle has been established, and that the interests of the States on both sides of the river require the construction of bridges occasionally across that river; and it is perfectly well settled that those bridges can be constructed so as not to obstruct navigation. I should certainly oppose any obstruction of navigation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to remind the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING,] who is opposed to these amendments, that this bill was originally introduced to authorize the construction of a bridge at St. Louis. It was amended in the Senate so as to provide for a bridge at Quincy and, I believe, another at Hannibal.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. The gentleman is wrong in that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It was also amended so as to authorize the construction of a bridge at Burlington, Iowa. Now, we simply desire that other points of quite as much importance as some of those provided for shall have the privilege of constructing bridges across the Mississippi river. The railroad connections at Keokuk are quite as important as those at Quincy. The railway connections there are quite as important as those at Burlington; and so it is at Dubuque. They are all important; and the break caused by the river in the connections of those lines is very serious.

Now, we ask that this bill, accompanied by these amendments, shall go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a committee appointed to consider measures of this character, in order that that committee may determine whether it is not as important to have these other points provided for as those already provided for by the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire the calm attention of the House for one moment in regard to this subject of bridging the Mississippi river. To us in the valley of the Mississippi this is certainly one of the most important questions before Congress. I may say that we are all in favor of bridging the Mississippi river, if it can be done without any material obstruction to its navigation. I am in favor of it, and I believe all the people are in favor of it; and both interests must yield a little.

But there have already been two bridges built across the Mississippi river, and all of us who live in the Mississippi valley know that those two bridges have been almost the greatest possible obstruction to the navigation of that river, and have caused to the people of that valley the loss of millions and millions of dollars of property. The value of the steamers that have been destroyed at Rock Island alone, I think, would amount to $1,000,000.

Now, if we in Congress are going forward to legislate upon this subject of bridging the Mississippi, a subject of vast importance, we should legislate with great care and with great deliberation. Now, I desire to say that I am opposed to sending this bill, with the amendments which have been introduced, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the reason that that committee has already ordered a bill to be reported to this House to legalize the Clinton bridge and make it a post route, taking from the people of the Mississippi valley all their rights and all their remedies in that regard. That committee is already committed in favor of this subject of obstructing the navigation of the Mississippi river by these bridges, and hence I say that I do not believe that it is just and fair that this bill should go to a committee already committed in its favor.

Now, I move to refer this bill with amendments to the Committee on Commerce. It may, perhaps, be objected that the Committee on Commerce has formed its opinion on this subject. If that is so, then I will not insist upon having this bill referred to that committee. But I do insist that a subject of this vast importance should go to some committee where the subject will be considered fairly and justly, with a due regard to the interests of all parties, and not in the interest of these railroad corporations, which have for one object the damming up of that great natural highway, in order that they may compel freight to go over their lines, and thus rob the people still further. I want this question considered fairly, and by a committee that is not prejudiced on this subject, and that has not committed itself to any particular line of policy.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. KASSON. I will hear it read.

Mr. ROSS. It is to add the following:

Provided, however, That said bridges shall not be so built as to obstruct or impair the navigation of the Mississippi river.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to having that amendment go to the committee with the other propositions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In view of the importance of this question, I will ask that a fair committee be appointed to consider it.

Mr. KASSON. I will say that this question has already been considered with great care and deliberation in the Senate. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] suggests that a special committee should be raised for the purpose of considering this subject. I do not like to take this subject from the jurisdiction of the committee to which it properly belongs, and have it go to another regular committee, as was first suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. I think the Post Office Committee is a competent committee to consider the question, as is also the Committee on Commerce. But in the Senate the subject went to the Post Office Committee. Its very title indicates that it should go there, and I for one will not discredit any regular committee. The only other alternative is that it should go to a special committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am willing to withdraw my motion for a special committee, as also my suggestion that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I will suggest that it should be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, which I am sure will prove to be an impartial committee.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. I will yield for an explanation, but I cannot yield the floor entirely.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I feel a deep interest in the subject of bridging the Mississippi. My district lies one hundred and fifty miles along the east bank of that river, including both rapids; and across the river into my district run four great lines of railroad which penetrate the great West beyond the Mississippi. My constituents as well as those of the gentlemen on the other side of the Mississippi are anxious to carry their business across that river to get their produce to market.

My constituents are equally interested with those of other gentlemen in maintaining an unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi. Sir, for thirty years I have fought against obstructions in the Mississippi. I fought against the construction of the bridge at Rock Island; and I have been opposed to all such bridges as would obstruct the navigation.

Now, sir, after weeks of labor, we have here a bill prepared upon the information of the ablest engineers of the country, and with the sanction of the War Department, by which it is provided that the railroad interest and those concerned in the transportation of freight by that mode of communication shall be accommodated, while the shipping interest upon the river shall also be accommodated.

I am in favor of the construction of a bridge at Keokuk. Those interested in that enterprise have had a committee here; and I have assisted them in their efforts to get a bill through Congress. But I do not wish that that project shall be tacked on to this bill so that the whole thing may go over to the next session. I had hoped, sir, that this bill would be referred by the House to some friendly committee that would report it back. It contains, I will state to the House, all the elements of a system of laws for the regulation of the construction of these bridges. The draw at Quincy is one hundred and sixty feet in the clear, a width far beyond that of the bridge at Rock Island, which was built without the authority of any law of Congress, and was a great obstruction. This bridge at Quincy, the proposed bridge at Burlington, and the one at Keokuk, are all unobjectionable, so far as I can judge from my investigation of the question.

I am aware of the zeal with which my colleague from the Galena district [Mr. WASHBURN] protects the navigation interests. I know very well that there is a very great prejudice against bridges; but I am happy to see that the honest sentiments of my friend have been modified, and that he publicly assents to the bridging of the river Mississippi. I beg him now to have this bill referred to a friendly committee if it must be referred at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose that it shall be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I desire that it shall not be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from the Quincy district, who is a friend of the original measure, to what committee he would prefer to have the bill referred. I am equally anxious with himself to have it go to a friendly committee, and at the same time a prudent one. I am desirous to oblige the gentleman. Does he desire it to go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or to the Committee on Roads and Canals?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I do not know what is the state of the business before those committees. I think I would prefer that it should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KASSON. Then we should never hear of the bill again.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I accept, then, the proposition to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KASSON. That is my original proposition. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire, Mr. Speaker, that this bill may be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because I know that that is a good committee.

Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] surrender the positions which he formerly held and yield his great Mississippi fight.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I occupy to-day the same position I always occupied. I was always willing to have the river bridged when it could be done without materially interfering with navigation.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been asserted over and over again, in and out of the House, that these bridges are nuisances and must come down. But, sir, in regard to the Rock Island bridge it has been shown that that is not an obstruction. The largest craft have, in great numbers—five or six hundred a season—passed there unobstructed; but when an old craft highly insured has run against the bridge and been destroyed, we have heard a great outcry about that bridge. It has been suspicious.

Now, sir, that bridge—I mean the Rock Island bridge—was constructed by eminent engineers, and if it is a nuisance there, it can be brought down by law. I suppose they want bridges at all these points, and I am willing that they shall have them. I am willing that this shall go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It is for the interest of the other side of the river, where they have ten times the business, east and west of that on the river, that they shall have all the accommodations which nature and art both give them. The people distant to the Pacific are interested in these crossings. The railroad system of this country, and especially that west of the river, is made to yield to the natural highways of commerce. We have there established a bridge which will admit transit east and west as well as up and down the river.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEY. I was not present and did not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, but I am informed that he reflected on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, charging that it was an unfair committee and in the interest of the railroads, and that he was opposed to any reference to that committee on that ground, asking at the same time that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, of which committee he is chairman.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman is mistaken. I said that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was a fair committee, and the gentleman from Illinois said nothing reflecting on the committee at all.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he reflected on that committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made no reflection on any committee. I trust I understand the rules too well for that. I stated the action of that committee and that it tended to strike down the interests of eight million people of the agricultural districts.

Mr. ALLEY. I understood the gentleman to have reflected on the action of the committee. I must have misapprehended, or rather I must have been misinformed, in reference to the position of the gentleman from Illinois. I understood that he reflected on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, charging them with unfairness. He disclaims any reflection on that committee, and of course I have nothing further to say.

In regard to the question before that committee in which that gentleman is interested, no action has been taken and no report made, and of course the gentleman can have no complaint.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLOW. I desire to state there are two Senate bills before the House providing for the construction of bridges across the Mississippi river. The city of St. Louis, its Chamber of Commerce, and its people, have united in declaring that no obstruction should be made to the navigation of a stream upon which floats the greatest commerce of the New World. It is therefore provided in reference to the bridge at that point so that any steamer may pass by that city on its way up the river without any detriment whatever. But, sir, if we pass this bill there will be a series of obstructions from the city of St. Louis to the falls of St. Anthony.

The bridge the gentleman has spoken of is one of the greatest obstructions, if not an absolute nuisance, causing extra insurance to be demanded by the insurance companies, and the loss of thousands of dollars' worth of valuable property annually. In addition to the natural obstructions it imposes a burden upon the cities on that stream which they are not able to bear. In adverse winds boats have had to remain for days at Rock Island. By this bill you propose to obstruct it at Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, and I do not know how many other places.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Has the gentleman examined the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BLOW. I have. They call for a draw of one hundred and sixty-five feet, leaving only a channel hardly the width of the vessels themselves.

Mr. KASSON. I ask as a point of order whether it is proper to discuss the merits of the bill on the motion to refer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That brings up the whole question.

Mr. KASSON. I presume the proper time for this debate will be when the bill has been returned from the committee. I understand it has been prepared with unusual care and on consultation with eminent engineers. We understand uniformly that a bridge near the city and within the district of a member of Congress is always large enough and high enough, in the opinion of that member, but that a bridge above or below obstructs commerce, by being too small, and therefore ought not to be allowed to remain.

I have submitted my amendment with special reference to the wants of central and western Iowa. We want a double outlet for our products, the unobstructed option of the Chicago and St. Louis markets, and competition between railroads for freight. With this bridge at Keokuk we can send our products to St. Louis without breaking bulk. From Des Moines as a common center there will be two routes open to Chicago, and one, if not two, to St. Louis, and all without the serious obstruction of breaking bulk at the river, with its heavy accompanying charges.

With these remarks I simply now desire, as I am pressed all around, and as there are other measures waiting that are urgent, to ask the previous question on the motion to refer this to the committee. The whole subject will be open for debate when it comes back.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether by the provisions of this charter the bridge company would be liable for damages growing out of obstruction of the navigation.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly they are if the bridge is improperly constructed, liable at common law.

Mr. BENJAMIN. They would not, if it is built according to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I have no sort of objection to the fullest debate, but I understand it to be the wish of the House not to discuss it now.

Mr. STEVENS. The merits of this bill are not open, and I trust it will not take up the whole day. Let it go to the committee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 80, extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I trust that may be considered now.

The bill was read in full. It extends the time for the completion of the first one hundred miles until June 27, 1866.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following amendment:

That the time for commencing and completing the Northern Pacific railroad and all its several sections is extended for the term of two years.

Mr. ROSS. Is that amendment germane to the subject? I raise the question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order. It relates to the building of railroads across the continent. It is a question for the House whether it will concur in the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. The object of the amendment is simply this: the original resolution proposed to extend the time for the completion of the southern branch of the Union Pacific railroad for a few months according to the recommendation of the message of the President. The time had expired. One and a half section had been finished, but not within the time required by law by a few days. The message of the President informed us that unless we extended the time the subsidy could not be granted. Two months are asked for. The amendment I offer is to give further time, but it proposes no advantage except the extension of the time.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the title of the bill was amended by adding thereto the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and the title amended; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK AND MONTANA MINING COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 203, to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make a statement. Several patriotic ladies have sent me a bill to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia. It is a very worthy object. I find among the managers the names of Mrs. General Sherman, Mrs. Carlile, Mrs. Todd, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Hale, Mrs. General Curtis, Mrs. General Scofield, and a great many others; and I venture to bring the matter to the consideration of the House. I have looked over this bill, and if the House, after hearing it read, sees nothing objectionable in it, I will ask to have it passed.

The bill was read.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire of my colleague if this bill does not take the custody of the property of these orphans out of the hands of their guardians, and give the control of it to this corporation.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask for the reading of the sixth section.

The Clerk read the section, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no child shall ever be bound out from this institution.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think that is practicable. If the institution is to raise them up in idleness, and never bind them out, it is contrary to all precedents that I ever heard of. I move to strike that section out, so as to leave it discretionary with the managers of the institution.

The motion was agreed to, and the sixth section was stricken out.

Mr. ROSS. I again ask my colleague if this bill does not take the custody of the persons and property of the children out of the hands of legally appointed guardians, and give it to this corporation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think that that is the construction of the bill.

Mr. ROSS. It appears to me from the reading of it that it is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman desires to amend it in that respect he can do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] that he offer an amendment providing that the bill shall not be construed in that way.

The SPEAKER. The section referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That upon any minor child being removed from or leaving this institution, as provided in the preceding section, and there being due to such minor child any pension or back pay from the United States Government, the directors of the institution shall retain control of such back pay or bounty until such child attains the age of majority, paying to such child during minority only the interest thereof, or such further sum as, in the discretion of the board, may be necessary for the support and maintenance of such minor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is a very good provision. I think no one can object to it. I think the House had better pass the bill.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I wish my colleague would explain why bounty money belonging to these orphans is safer in the hands of the directors of this corporation than in those of the agents which the law provides. Guardians are safer depositaries than these directors, who may or may not be good. They are good now, no doubt. But the institution may degenerate, as many things do in this world.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague entirely misapprehends the character of this bill. It is certainly for one of the most laudable objects to which our attention could possibly be called, and I think the provision to which the gentleman alludes is one of the best provisions of the bill. It provides that the funds of these orphans shall be kept by the institution, and the interest paid to them, until they come of age. The bill is designed for the purpose of protecting, educating, and caring for the orphans of soldiers and sailors.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to strike out that eighth section.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest to my colleague if it would not be better to refer this bill to the Judiciary Committee or some other committee that will examine it. I have no objection to the object of the bill, but I think it had better be referred and examined.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I have no objection to its reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House desires it—

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I have the floor now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then let the gentleman take charge of the bill.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I will take charge of it if the gentleman wants me to.

We have a system of laws throughout the United States by which the interest of the minor children of our dead soldiers is secured. The Government itself which makes these grants to these orphans provides a place where this money shall be cared for and kept safe and secure. But, overriding all that system, it is proposed to provide here by a general sweeping clause that whenever the money of these orphans gets into the hands of this corporation, the custody of the funds shall be in the management of these directors. To that I am opposed. It is too large and sweeping a provision. I do not understand how the funds of these orphans will ever get into the possession of these directors. I shall move to refer the bill, unless my colleague will consent to strike out this section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman can make his motion, and the House can do what they please about it.

Mr. DELANO. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. DELANO. I make that motion, then, in entire friendship to the measure, and simply because I do not think it is likely to be perfected in this mode. And I move that the committee have leave to report it at any time.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Then I withdraw my motion to strike out the eighth section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I assent to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. I have no desire to press this bill against the objection of a single man here.

Mr. DELANO. I have no objection to the bill. My object is to get it through.

The motion was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WILLIAM J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 155, concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution providing that the standing Committees of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire and report what further provision, if any, should be made for the accommodation of the State Department, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 99) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Albany, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of said State;

An act (S. No. 230) to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

An act (S. No. 274) for the relief of John Ericsson; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 71) referring the petition and papers in the case of Joseph Nock to the Court of Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DELANO, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers, copies being left, in the cases of W. P. Jones, Benjamin Roach, J. A. Hudnall, and Amistad T. M. Filler.

On motion of Mr. ORTH, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of James Nokes, copies being left.

WISCONSIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution explanatory of and in addition to the act of May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ESTABLISHMENT OF POST ROUTES.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish certain post routes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WEST VIRGINIA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I ask consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table, and have referred to the Committee on Appropriations, Senate bill No. 230, to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, unless it be to refer to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. It makes a specific appropriation, and therefore should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it is high time this question of jurisdiction over bills of this character should be determined by this House. The Committee on Appropriations has no right to consider these bills, but they should go to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. As objection is made the bill will not be taken up now.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] withdraws the objection he made some time since to allowing the Committee on Territories to have an hour for the consideration of their business after the morning hour of to-morrow shall have been concluded.

Mr. DEMING. I renew the objection.

WAGON ROAD IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask unanimous consent to have the following preamble and resolution considered at this time:

Whereas an act of Congress was passed March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska;" and whereas by said act the sum of $20,000 was appropriated for the construction of a wagon road from a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sioux river, via Yankton, Dakota Territory, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Cheyenne river, thence up said river to its main fork, thence up the north fork to a point of intersection with the road from Niobrara; and whereas the work on said wagon road is reported to have been commenced and far advanced in 1865, by orders from the Secretary of the Interior, during the prosecution of which work treaties are claimed to have been made with the Indian tribes occupying the country through which said road is located, by which the right of way was secured to the United States; and whereas the Secretary of the Interior is represented to have ordered a suspension of work upon said Cheyenne road, and required the superintendent having charge of the construction of the same, to turn over all of the stock, implements, and money appropriated and purchased for the said road to the superintendent of the Niobrara road, whereby the opening and construction of the Cheyenne road are prevented, to the great injury of the Territory of Dakota: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform this House whether the work on the said road has been arrested or interrupted by his orders, and if so, for what reason the same has been done; whether any of the moneys appropriated thereto have been diverted to the uses of the Niobrara or any other road mentioned in said act, with the authority, if any in that case, for said diversion.

Mr. GRINNELL. Before determining whether I shall object to the introduction of this resolution at this time, I would inquire of the gentleman whether he has sought the information he asks at the Department of the Interior, and if he has been unable to obtain it there.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will say that two years ago an appropriation was made for the construction of this wagon road. Since that time it is said that treaties have been made with the Indians along the line of the road, and it is said that the Government has secured the right of way for the road along there. I now understand that since those treaties have been made orders have been issued to suspend work upon this road, upon the ground that the Indians will not allow it to proceed. Now, I want to know whether there is anything in those treaties, or whether they are mere shams.

I have applied, but have not been able to obtain the information at the Interior Department, and I have introduced this resolution in order to ascertain the facts in the case.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I object.

FREDERICK COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Frederick county, Virginia, asking that that county be attached to the State of West Virginia; and the same was laid upon the table.

JOHN ERICSSON.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, Senate bill No. 274, for the relief of John Ericsson.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was accordingly read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Ericsson the sum of $13,930, in full for his services in planning the United States war steamer Princeton, and in planning and superintending the construction of the machinery for the same.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to its reference. It contains an appropriation and will have to go to the Committee of the Whole, anyhow, when it shall be reported from that committee.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BEAMAN: The claim of Henry P. Sanger, for services rendered as book-keeper and teller in the office of H. K. Sanger, late United States depository.

By Mr. BROMWELL: The petition of Thomas A. Cosgrove, and others, praying for a law regulating insurance.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of Dr. J. A. Meredith, asking that certain medicines be exempt from taxation.

By Mr. FERRY: The memorial of J. C. Lewis, and 16 others, citizens of Washington, praying for the passage of a law regulating inter-State insurances.

By Mr. GLOSSBRENNER: The petition of Arthur W. Farquhar, of York county, Pennsylvania, praying compensation for certain merchandise furnished to the Government in 1864 under contract.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of merchants and citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the officers and men of the Kearsarge be rewarded for the sinking of the Alabama, as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The memorial of H. A. Harvey, of New York City, praying for the extension of certain patents for the manufacture of wood screws issued respectively.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition from citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, asking an increase of duties on foreign wools.

By Mr. SAWYER: The petition of A. V. Balch, and 20 others, citizens of Waupaca county, Wisconsin, praying for an enactment of equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of physicians of Eaton, Ohio, praying that medicines and preparations of the United States or other national Pharmacopoeia, of which the full and proper formula is published in the dispensatories, &c., be placed on the free list, inasmuch as the high tax on alcohol is sufficient to exempt them from tax on "official medicines."

By Mr. STEVENS: The petition of John McGarrish, asking for increase of pension.

Also, two petitions of Cary Ahl, and numerous others, citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for protection for American industry.

Also, the petition of Elizabeth Klinger, praying for a pension.

Also, the petition of Martha R. Bauer, praying for a pension.

By Mr. WELKER: The petition of J. H. Fay, and 66 others, wool-growers of Lorain county, Ohio, asking protection on wool.

Also, the petition of R. C. Fenn, and 27 others, wool-growers of Medina county, Ohio, asking for the same.

Also, the petition of Charles Boydston, and 23 others, wool-growers of Wayne county, Ohio, asking for the same.

By Mr. WINDOM: The petition of J. C. Easton, and 22 others, citizens of Minnesota, asking the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds.

Also, the petition of J. S. Sawyer, and 27 others, citizens of Minnesota, on the same subject.

Also, the petition of Gardner Darr, and 71 others, citizens of Minnesota, asking an increased tariff on wool.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The petition of Alfred Hull, and 66 others, citizens of Wallingford, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on foreign wool.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. DARLING: A bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the proper party or parties the amount of tax paid under section seven of the act to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, passed March 7, 1864, upon spirits imported prior to the date of said act.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 4, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the petition of many thousands of the working men and trades societies of the city of San Francisco, California, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in which they say:

"We, the undersigned citizens of the State of California, respectfully pray that you will be pleased to enact that eight hours shall be the period fixed for a legal day's work of labor, as to all workmen, artisans, or laborers in the employ of the United States; and that as weights, measures, &c., have been fixed and ascertained by law, you will, in like manner and spirit, fix the number of hours at eight, which shall constitute a legal day's labor."

I simply desire to say, Mr. President, in connection with the presentation of this petition, that the subject was before the Legislature of California on a like petition to this, and it was believed for a length of time by the workmen of that State that favorable action would be had upon it. I doubt not that State action is the more legitimate mode of arriving at this result than Federal action; but it will be observed that the petition only asks that a law be passed to fix the hours of labor which shall constitute a legal day's work in the employment of the United States.

I desire to say in addition, on presenting this petition, and I speak from a long experience, that I fully believe labor would be as profitable to the whole nation if eight hours constituted a legal day's work as now that ten hours mostly do so, because I believe that the labor which could be and would then be performed in eight hours would be fully the equivalent of the labor that is generally performed now in ten hours. I present the petition and move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom a like petition, I believe, has heretofore been referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a memorial of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, and praying Congress to reimburse certain moneys expended by Massachusetts for the common defense. This memorial, which is somewhat elaborate, sets forth at length the occasion on which these moneys were expended by Massachusetts and why Massachusetts undertook to expend them, and the consequent liability of the United States to reimburse them; and it concludes as follows:

"The government of Massachusetts under instructions from the General Government acted with all its accustomed vigor and liberality, and may now justly call upon the parental authorities of the general Union for the measure of equity in reimbursement, of which the expectation was raised by their own promise. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, therefore, through its Legislature, respectfully asks that Congress will pass an act to provide for the refunding by the General Government of the expenditures made by Massachusetts as herein stated and explained."

This memorial is duly authenticated by the officers of the Legislature. I offer it and move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; and at the same time, as it is a memorial from a State, I presume that if it does not come positively within the rule of the Senate, I shall not go too far if I ask that it be printed.

The memorial was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of William Syphax, who represents that some forty years ago the late Mr. Custis, of Arlington, gave to his mother, Maria Syphax, on manumitting her, a piece of land of fifteen acres; and he asks that Congress may confirm the title to that piece of ground to his mother and her heirs. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I present the memorial of the Sons of Temperance and Good Templars of Worcester, Massachusetts, in which they set forth that they are members of an organization of two hundred and fifty thousand persons in the United States, and they go on to speak of the evils brought upon the country, in the public service, civil, military, and naval, by intoxication; and they ask Congress to pass a law providing that intoxication shall work a dismissal of any public officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the country. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Midland, Michigan, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Saginaw to some point on Lake Michigan in the direction of Bay de Noquette and in the Grand Traverse region; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present a memorial from ninety-five citizens of the counties of Dorset and Somerset, in Maryland, stating that they were assessed by General Lockwood in several thousand dollars for the purpose of rebuilding a church that had been burned, and with the burning of which they say they had nothing to do. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented six memorials from citizens of Alexandria city and county, Virginia, remonstrating against the proposed retrocession of that county to the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 519) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved June 24, 1864, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 46) for the relief of Henry M. Whittlesey, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 95) providing for the appointment of a commission to purchase a site and erect a building for a post office, custom-house, and for holding the courts of the United States, in the city of St. Paul, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 386) for the relief of Francis A. Gibbons, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat City of Richmond to the City of Portland, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 222) further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 303) for the relief of Joshua Hill, which was read twice by its title, and with the accompanying papers presented by him, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 304) for the relief of Mrs. Eastman, mother and sole heir of Alfred W. Eastman, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIDDLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 305) to amend an act entitled "An act concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 306) relating to the granting of passports; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Territories:

A bill (H. R. No. 179) amendatory of the organic act of Washington Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 202) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana," approved May 26, 1864; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to facilitate communication with certain Territories.

REV. HARRISON HEERMANCE.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call up a joint resolution which I supposed was passed the other day; but I find it was not. It is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers, which was recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs for the purpose of having a report in the case, and again reported with a report which has been printed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADVERSE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. CLARK. I asked the Senate the day before yesterday to allow me some time to-day for the business of the Committee on Claims; and if there be no pressing business in the morning hour, I should like to begin now, so as to get through early. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report No. 2 of the Committee on Claims on the petition of John Nabb and Sarah Nabb, an adverse report.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN NABB.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

Mr. CLARK. Perhaps I can state the case a little more succinctly than it is stated in the report. The petitioners in this case state three accounts for which they ask payment of the United States, the first of which is an account for damage to the three-story brick and tile house No. 70 Church street, Charleston, South Carolina, for which they ask the United States to pay $1,504 44. They also state an account for the rent of the house and for the price of a slave who was sold and the price went into the hands of a trustee of theirs, appointed by them, and for that they ask the United States to pay $3,125. They also ask that the United States shall pay them the amount of a deposit which they made in a savings bank in Charleston, South Carolina, which they lost in the rebellion, amounting to $678. The committee report an adverse resolution that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted; and I think that is evident without stating the case further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

F. A. LEWIS.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 6) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of F. A. Lewis.

Mr. CLARK. The report of the committee in this case is as follows:

The petitioner sets forth that, in consequence of the legislation of Congress, he has been unjustly deprived of his property to the value of $15,527, the larger portion being negroes; and further, that the so-called confederate government has taken from him his other property to the value of $4,000, for which that government promised to pay him; and as the United States have overthrown the confederate government, they are justly responsible for its debts.

The committee are unable to appreciate the soundness or justice of the reasoning in relation to either portion of this claim.

The petitioner has deemed it unnecessary to fortify either portion of his claims with a particle of evidence beyond his own statement. The committee, in view of the foregoing allegations, ask the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of F. A. Lewis ought not to be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

OWNERS OF THE BRIG SABAO.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 8) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of David Baker, Mowrey & Steere, Samuel True, and Nathaniel Crowell, owners of the brig Sabao.

Mr. CLARK. The committee in this case report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted, and unless some one desires to have the report read, or some portion of it stated, showing the nature of the case, I will ask the Senate to take the question on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

J. W. DOWNEY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 9) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of J. W. Downey.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays for the restoration of his real estate taken and sold under the confiscation act, and the committee report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

SELINA BARCLAY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 10) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Selina Barclay.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays for relief for the burning of her house which was burnt by the destruction of the navy-yard at Gosport, Virginia, by the rebels. The committee report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

JOHN AHERN.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 12) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of John Ahern.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays to be indemnified for loss on a contract with the acting assistant provost marshal general of the northern district of New York for board and rations furnished to the United States for soldiers and recruits at the city of Albany in 1863, 1864, and 1865; and the committee report adversely to the prayer of the petitioner.

The report was agreed to.

JEROME B. PILLOW.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 15) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Jerome B. Pillow.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner sets forth that he is a loyal citizen of Arkansas and asks pay for cotton which was carried away by our soldiers. The committee report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

JOHN EGNOLF.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 16) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of John Egnolf.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays for compensation for the loss of a California bond. The committee report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was agreed to.

WARREN, HOOD, AND HUMPHREY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 18) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of George Warren, Daniel Hood, and Calvin R. Humphrey.

Mr. CLARK. The committee in this case report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

The resolution was agreed to.

MRS. KATE PETTIT.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 19) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Mrs. Kate Pettit.

Mr. CLARK. I call the attention of the Senate to the report in this case, as it is short, and involves, perhaps, a new principle.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petitions and papers relative to the claim of Mrs. Kate Pettit, have considered the same, and make the following report:

The petitioner alleges that, in July, 1865, she was walking on the sidewalk of a street in the city of Georgetown in this District, and was knocked down by a Government wagon through the careless or reckless management of the driver; that, as a consequence, she was by this accident seriously and irreparably injured, whereby she lost the use of one of her arms, and was put to great cost and expense.

She also alleges that she is a widow in indigent circumstances, with two small children dependent upon her for support.

Considering the allegations and circumstances in this case to be proved, the committee know of no rule by which the Government can be held for the illegal and unauthorized acts of its servants; cases of this character may appeal to our sympathy, but from reasons of public policy can never be allowed as claims by Congress.

The committee recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

ALONZO MORSE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 20) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Alonzo Morse.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays indemnification for certain United States notes lost by the burning of his dwelling-house, and the committee make an adverse report. The notes were in part compound-interest notes, and in part notes which could not be identified. The Treasury Department paid him for those which could be identified, and the committee report against the balance of the claim, on the ground that there is no identification.

The report was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL REYNOLDS.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 21) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel S. M. Reynolds.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner prays to be relieved from responsibility for money stolen from him on the 22d December 1865; and I call the attention of the Senate to it, as the money was lost at one of the banking-houses in this city. The committee come to an adverse conclusion on this matter, and report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was agreed to.

SWEENEY, RITTENHOUSE AND COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 22) of the Committee on Claims on the petition of Sweeney, Rittenhouse, Fant & Co.

Mr. CLARK. The prayer of the petition in this case is that they be allowed to go to the Court of Claims. They have been once to the Court of Claims, and had an adverse report, when the court consisted of three judges; and they want now, when it consists of five, to see if they cannot get a favorable report. The Committee on Claims came to the conclusion to report against it.

The report was agreed to.

FRANCIS MILLER.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report (No. 23) of the Committee on Claims, on the petition of Francis Miller.

Mr. CLARK. This petitioner entered into contract with the Government for the furnishing of certain supplies, the price of which he found afterward to be raised in the market, and he refused to deliver the supplies. He now asks that the Government should pay him that portion of the money which was retained upon his contract for the portion that he did furnish. The committee came to the conclusion that it should not be paid to him because he refused to perform his contract. They therefore report a resolution that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The resolution was adopted.

JOHN R. BROWN.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report of the Committee on Claims on the petition of John R. Brown.

Mr. CLARK. This is a claim for damages for the seizure of a vessel by some of our naval vessels as a blockade-runner. The committee came to the conclusion that there was probable cause for the seizure, and that no damages should be paid.

The report was agreed to.

P. A. WHEELER.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is one not printed, on the petition of P. A. Wheeler. It is an adverse report. I move that it be agreed to.

The report was agreed to.

CYRUS M. HARMON.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 37, on the case of Cyrus M. Harmon. The petitioner was the owner of a newspaper in West Virginia, and the rebels got possession of a large portion of the country, embracing the county of Jackson, where he lived, and on the 4th of September, 1864, occupied Ravenswood, and immediately destroyed the presses, stock, and type of the establishment. He desires the United States to pay for it. The committee came to the conclusion to report adversely.

The report was agreed to.

COLONEL D. D. TOMPKINS.

Mr. CLARK. The next adverse report is No. 40, on the petition of the executors of the late Colonel D. D. Tompkins. Colonel Tompkins was ordered to reside in the barracks furnished for the United States troops at New Orleans. He chose afterward to reside in the city, and he demanded commutation for rent and quarters, which the Department refused to allow him. The committee think the Department were right, and therefore recommend that the prayer of the petition be refused.

The report was agreed to.

EPHRAIM HUNT.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 41, on the petition of Ephraim Hunt.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In regard to that there have been several reports in favor of Ephraim Hunt which have been acted upon by this body, and a bill has been passed. There is now an adverse report. If the Senator is willing I should prefer that it should lie over.

Mr. CLARK. I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The case will be passed over.

REBECCA S. MINOR.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 42, on the petition of Rebecca S. Minor. The petitioner asks for compensation for fences and buildings taken by troops of the United States near Natchez, Mississippi, and used for fuel. The case was wholly unsupported by evidence, and the committee recommend that she have leave to withdraw her petition.

The report was agreed to.

MARIA GENAUD.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 48, on the claim of Maria Genaud, heir of Jean Hudry. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report was agreed to.

GEORGE D. C. HIBBS.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 49, on the petition of George D. C. Hibbs. The committee report against the claim.

The report was agreed to.

MARY E. TWIFORD.

Mr. CLARK. The next is No. 52, in the case of Mary E. Twiford. I think one of the Senators from West Virginia presented the petition in this case. The committee came to the conclusion that they did not see any ground on which the claim could be allowed. It is a case where a house belonging to a widow lady was burned by the rebels because, as was supposed, she had given information to our troops.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I think the Senator is mistaken about that claim having been presented by any of the Senators from West Virginia.

Mr. CLARK. I may be mistaken about that. I merely mentioned that because I did not know but that the Senators might desire their attention called to it.

The report was agreed to.

ANTHONY S. ROBINSON.

Mr. CLARK. The next report is No. 56, on the petition of Anthony S. Robinson. It is an adverse report, that the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted.

The report was agreed to.

AARON VAN CAMP.

Mr. CLARK. The next is No. 57, on the petition of Aaron Van Camp and Virginus P. Chapin, an adverse report.

The report was agreed to.

THOMAS LAURENT.

Mr. CLARK. The next is No. 61, an adverse report in the case of Thomas Laurent.

The report was agreed to.

H. CLAY WOOD.

Mr. CLARK. The next is an adverse report, No. 62, on the petition of H. Clay Wood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have that laid over. I believe I presented the papers.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to its lying over for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The case will be passed over by common consent, no Senator insisting upon a vote.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

Mr. CLARK. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes, on which there is pending a motion to reconsider.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator whether, as that will occasion considerable debate, he had not better pass it over, and take up the other bills which will not occasion debate, and dispose of them in the first place.

Mr. CLARK. I propose to take the question upon the reconsideration first, and I think that will not lead to much debate; and then, if the vote is reconsidered, I will agree to postpone the bill and take up the other bills. I do not know that anybody wants to debate it upon the motion to reconsider. I propose simply to make a very short statement in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed?

Mr. CLARK. This bill was passed by the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress, and came to the Senate and was passed here. The committee had examined the claim very thoroughly, and came to the conclusion, I think unanimously, that the claim ought to be paid. The bill was passed. The bill having been passed by both Houses of Congress, it went to the enrolling clerk. But by a mistake of the clerk it failed to be enrolled, and did not reach the President for his signature. The bill was reintroduced and taken up, I think, on the first or second day of this session, and was passed by the Senate and sent to the other House. It was then brought back here by a message for the purpose of entering a motion to reconsider.

I desire to state that this loss of the party is fully proved. The value of the property is fully proved. The title is fully proved. The Union sentiments and services of the man who makes the claim are fully proved. It is also fully proved that the man himself furnished a good deal of information and assistance to the troops of the United States. It is proved that his wife left her home in the night time, and came through our lines for the purpose of delivering information, and was fired upon by the pickets. It is proved, also, as bearing on the Unionism of this man, that he has a son who has been in our service through the rebellion, and is still in the service. I hope it will not be reconsidered, but I am willing to have the question taken without any further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider its vote passing the bill?

Mr. NESMITH. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire what amount is appropriated by this bill.

Mr. CLARK. About ten thousand dollars. It has been objected by some Senator that it will lead to a large outlay and expenditure; but from the experience and information of the Committee on Claims I think there are no facts to justify that fear. It does not seem to me to be so.

Mr. WILSON. As the bill has been once passed by the Senate the whole question is involved in the reconsideration. If the Senator from New Hampshire is willing to let the vote passing it be reconsidered, and then to let it lie over without action, I have no objection.

Mr. CLARK. I do not propose to let it lie over longer than until we have considered certain other bills. I am willing, as a test of the sense of the Senate, to take the vote upon the reconsideration without further debate, and then, if the bill should be reconsidered, to let it lie over, for we can debate it fully on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. The reconsideration covers the whole question; and if it should happen not to be reconsidered the bill passes out of our power. We have got to meet it now, therefore. If we go on with this question at this time I suppose the Senator will hardly have time to consider his other propositions. I suggest that he allow the vote on the passage of the bill to be reconsidered, or else let the whole question go over.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I will let it pass by, and take up other bills, if Senators desire to debate it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be reconsidered first.

Mr. CLARK. No, I do not propose to have it reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be passed by, no objection being made to that course.

AMOSKEAG MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. CLARK. I move now to take up the bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company the sum of $1,650, in full for three regimental cook wagons furnished the Government in 1861.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to know why the company did not get their pay if they furnished these wagons. If the wagons were furnished by the company upon an order from the quartermaster or from any competent authority they ought to have got their pay. Why did they not?

Mr. CLARK. I will state that these wagons were furnished on the order of General Frémont when he was in command at St. Louis; they were well made, and the bills for them were reasonable. The claim was presented to the quartermaster and the parties relied upon the quartermaster, submitting it to the commission which was organized to consider the claims for supplies furnished under General Frémont, but the quartermaster neglected to do so, supposing that the parties would present it to the commission. For this reason the claim failed to be presented to the commissioners, and the parties were not paid on that account. The wagons were taken and used, and were serviceable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. E. BRYANT.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 214) for the benefit of Colonel R. E. Bryant was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow R. E. Bryant, late commissary of subsistence, on settlement of his account, a credit of $1,484 13, the vouchers and accounts for which were lost and destroyed, falling into the hands of the enemy at Holly Springs, Mississippi, on the 20th day of September, 1862, if on examining the evidence by the Commissary General he shall deem him justly entitled to the credit; but the credit is not to be allowed unless the Commissary General shall certify approval thereof.

Mr. CLARK. I will say that the committee have examined the papers and find that the case is well proved before them; but have put in the clause requiring the approval of the Commissary General, so that if anything should occur at the Department the claim need not be paid unless it be right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 26) to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas;

A bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union; and

A bill (S. No. 155) concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada.

DANIEL WINSLOW.

Mr. CLARK. I move to take up Senate bill No. 149, for the relief of Daniel Winslow.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release and relieve Daniel Winslow and his legal representatives from all judgments, and from all liens and incumbrances of judgments in favor of the United States, heretofore obtained against Winslow, in any district court of the United States, upon a contract entered into by him with the chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, to deliver at the navy-yard in Charlestown, Massachusetts, eighteen hundred barrels of Navy beef; which contract was dated September 29, 1846; the meaning of the act being to release Winslow from all liability arising out of the contract or any bond given to secure its performance thereof, and from all judgments founded on the same, whether against himself alone or himself and his sureties, but not to relieve him of any levies heretofore made or sums paid on those judgments.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the ground of that?

Mr. CLARK. I am asked by the Senator from Maryland to State the ground of the claim. During the Mexican war this party made a contract with the Government to furnish a certain amount of beef for the Navy. He went on to furnish the beef, but the price of beef rose very much upon his hands. He still, however, continued to furnish, as far as he was able, until he became entirely ruined. His property was seized and all his lands and goods taken. His bondsmen were some years ago released. The man himself has nothing. He has acted honestly and done everything he could, and the committee think he should be relieved.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. CROWELL.

Mr. CLARK. I move to take up Senate bill No. 278.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 278) for the relief of Captain John H. Crowell, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By its provisions the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are to be authorized to allow Captain John H. Crowell, on a settlement of his accounts, a credit of $225, for so much money disbursed by him to persons in the service of the United States, in payment for such services, the vouchers for which payment were captured by the rebels and destroyed in an attack upon the camp at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, where he was stationed on the 5th day of August, 1862, if, on examining the accounts of Crowell, the Quartermaster General shall deem him justly entitled to this credit, and shall certify his approval thereof to the accounting officers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. L. B. CLARKE.

Mr. CLARK. I move next to take up House bill No. 347.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Treasurer of the United States to pay the sum of $1,500 to R. L. B. Clarke, in full for the time and expense incurred by him in contesting the seat of Augustus Hall, from the first district of Iowa, in the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of a House bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, but affecting claims. It is a bill extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 478) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides in the first section that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of any paymaster, quartermaster, commissary of subsistence, or other disbursing officer of the United States, or of his administrators or executors, for relief from responsibility on account of losses by capture or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, of Government funds, vouchers, records, and papers in his charge, and for which such officer was and is held responsible; but an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court as in other cases.

By the second section, whenever the Court of Claims shall have ascertained the facts of any such loss to have been without fault or neglect on the part of any such officer, it is to make a decree setting forth the amount thereof, upon which the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are to allow to such officer the amount so decreed as a credit in the settlement of his accounts.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not understand what committee it was that reported this bill.

Several SENATORS. The Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK. We were all agreed upon it in the Judiciary Committee. It does not increase the jurisdiction very much, but sends a class of cases to the court which are now very troublesome to us.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It appears to me, from the reading of it, to change the burden of proof in regard to these quartermasters' and commissaries' claims.

Mr. CLARK. It simply sends these cases to the Court of Claims, where they are examined much more thoroughly, where the Government is heard from; but if they come before the Committee on Claims there is nobody to represent the Government. The Committee on the Judiciary thought it much safer to let them go before the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire what is meant by the last section of this bill. Suppose a balance should be found in favor of a quartermaster or other officer; is it intended that a decree shall be entered up against the Government of the United States?

Mr. CLARK. No; it does not allow a set-off.

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose there is a balance found in favor of the disbursing officer against the Government over and above the charges against him.

Mr. CLARK. This is confined to a certain class of cases, those where vouchers or funds have been lost, and to reach no other class of cases. There have been a good many of these cases arising during the war, where the vouchers have been captured by the enemy, where they have been destroyed, sometimes by fire, or otherwise, or inevitable casualty. The committee thought it was very much better that they should go before the Court of Claims than to come before the committees of the two Houses, where they now come, because they are examined in the court more thoroughly; there is there an officer of the Government to appear in behalf of the Government, whereas before the committees we have no such officer and very often have no such proof except such as we can get by sending to the Departments. The Committee on the Judiciary, therefore—I think they were unanimous in regard to it—came to the conclusion that it was better that the parties should go to the Court of Claims for that purpose. The bill, however, does not undertake to allow the court to adjudicate upon any balance of accounts.

The bill was passed.

LOUDON COUNTY LOYALISTS.

Mr. CLARK. The next bill is the bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of loyal citizens of Loudon county, Virginia. That bill is in charge of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.] I do not see him in his seat, and I propose, therefore, to let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will not be taken up without a motion.

Mr. CLARK. As the Senate is thin, and the only remaining bill is that of Mr. Ames, and it may be desirable that Senators should be present when that is disposed of, I propose to pass it over at present, and I shall move, at some favorable moment, that it be taken up.

QUARTERMASTER AND COMMISSARY SUPPLIES.

Mr. POLAND. I move that Senate bill No. 217 be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 217) to provide for the payment for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes that all claims of loyal persons, not exceeding $500, for quartermasters' stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States and receipted for by the proper officer receiving them, or which may have been taken by such officer without giving such receipt, may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as the claimant can present of the facts in his case; and the Quartermaster General is to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the claimant, at the time the claim accrued, was loyal to the Government of the United States, and has ever since so remained, and has never in any way voluntarily aided the rebellion, and that the stores were actually received or taken for the use of and used by the Army, he is to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement. A similar provision is made in regard to all claims of loyal persons, not exceeding $500, for subsistence actually furnished to the Army.

It is further provided that all loyal persons having claims exceeding $500 for quartermasters' stores, or for subsistence, actually furnished to the Army of the United States, and receipted for by the proper officer, or which may have been taken by such officers without giving a receipt, for the use of and actually used by the Army, may prosecute their claims against the United States in the Court of Claims, in the manner and to the extent now provided by law for the prosecution of claims against the United States in that court; and if the claimant shall establish by evidence that at the time his claim accrued he was loyal to the United States and has ever since so remained, and that he has never in any way voluntarily aided the rebellion, the court shall render judgment in his favor for so much of his claim as is found to be justly due.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the bill by adding to the third section these words:

And such judgments shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for the payment for quartermasters' stores and subsistence respectively.

Mr. WILSON. Why not let these claims, like others, wait for the proper appropriation?

Mr. POLAND. This merely makes provision for the payment of the judgments that are authorized. It is not an appropriation of itself.

Mr. CLARK. With the permission of the Senator from Vermont, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this amendment provides for the payment of these claims out of the proper fund. They are properly quartermasters' and commissaries' charges, and this amendment simply is that they shall be paid out of those funds, and not out of the general fund, so as to be chargeable to the quartermaster's and subsistence departments respectively.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The committee thought there was some danger in permitting these claims for quartermasters' and commissary stores to be paid on the mere certificate of a quartermaster or commissary. That is the present law, and under it they are referred to clerks, although they involve very large amounts. We thought it safer, where the amount of the claim exceeds $500, to send it to the Court of Claims. At present, if the claims are allowed they are paid out of the funds appropriated for the commissary and quartermaster's departments. Now, we propose to send them to the Court of Claims, and it is proper that they should be paid out of the same fund that they would if allowed at the office. The opinion of the committee was that it was safer, where they exceeded $500, to make the parties go into the court, where the question will be examined on both sides.

Mr. GRIMES. Does it send all cases there?

Mr. TRUMBULL. All above $500—all that class of cases which the law covers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GRIMES. Does this cover everything—transportation, &c., I would inquire of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont has charge of the bill.

Mr. POLAND. The first two sections of the bill provide, the one for the payment of quartermasters' stores, and the other for the payment of subsistence. These two sections are precise copies of an act that was passed a year or two ago, except that they restrict the amount of claims which can be settled in the department to those not exceeding five hundred dollars. The third section of the bill provides that claims of the character named in the first two sections above $500 shall go to the Court of Claims, and the bill is extended in both classes of claims, irrespective of the amount of the claims, to the claims of loyal citizens in all parts of the United States. These are the only changes in the present law.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator who reported this bill that it does not embrace as much as it ought to embrace. It ought to embrace cases of transportation. There has been more swindling and fraud perpetrated against the Government growing out of charter-parties for transport ships—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Are not those all settled?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. I know of some most enormous cases which are yet in abeyance, and I trust the committee will amend this bill so as to include them.

Mr. POLAND. Claims for quartermasters' stores below $500 it is provided shall be settled at the Quartermaster General's Office, and claims for subsistence below $500 are to be settled by the Commissary General; and then the bill provides that both classes of claims above $500 shall go to the Court of Claims and be settled there.

Mr. GRIMES. I find no fault with the bill as it stands. It embraces quartermasters' stores; but the term "quartermasters' stores" does not include claims for transportation; I mean sea-going transportation and river transportation, which has amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars during the war. Many of those claims are still in abeyance, unadjudicated, unsettled. What I desire is, that these large claims shall also go to the Court of Claims and be adjudicated there, instead of being decided by a clerk in the quartermasters' department. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont to change his bill, so as to include all claims growing out of transportation by water.

Mr. POLAND. I do not see that there can be any objection to that, but under the third section of this bill all claims of that character above $500 are to go to the Court of Claims. It would be hardly proper of course to send that class of claims to the Quartermaster General's Office or to the Commissary General.

Mr. GRIMES. The Quartermaster General has that now. All charter-parties for the transportation of troops or munitions of war are made by the quartermaster's department, and not by the commissary department or any other bureau.

Mr. POLAND. Are those claims now settled in the Quartermaster General's Office?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. What I want is not only to include quartermasters' stores, which are included in the bill, but to include all claims growing out of transportation by land or water for the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Iowa will observe that this bill is not intended to take away the general jurisdiction of the quartermaster and commissary departments to settle for supplies and the general business of those departments. It covers only the class of cases where there is a controversy, and it is limited to cases where supplies have been taken by the proper officer and a receipt given for them, or where they were taken by the proper officer and no receipt given, and where the claimant was a loyal man at the time the property was taken, and has remained a loyal man ever since. The bill is only intended to apply to that class of cases. They would not settle those claims in the quartermaster and commissary departments because the proper vouchers had not been given. We passed a law one or two years ago authorizing the Quartermaster and Commissary Generals to settle that class of cases, where the receipt had been given by the proper officer, or where he had not given a receipt, if the property was taken and used by the Army, and the man from whom it was taken was a loyal man at the time, and has continued loyal since. They have been settling those claims. It was limited originally to claims that existed in the loyal States. This bill proposes to extend that provision to all similar cases—the Senator from West Virginia had a case up the other day—to all similar cases all over the United States, in disloyal as well as loyal States, wherever the proper officers took the property for the service of the Army and the vouchers were not executed. Now, instead of allowing those claims to be settled in the quartermaster and commissary departments, they are transferred above a certain amount—I am not sure about the amount—to the Court of Claims. That is all there is of this bill. It was not intended to give the Court of Claims a general jurisdiction in regard to cases where the proper vouchers exist and where by the existing laws these departments would have authority under the general law to settle the claim. It would involve another very serious question if you imposed upon the Court of Claims the passing upon all these accounts for transportation where there was a controversy about them. They could not do it. I think that would be too extensive a change. There would be an objection perhaps to it, that to take that general class of cases the court would have to have a great many clerks, and it would be impossible to do the business in the court.

Mr. GRIMES. This is a subject that I have no charge of. I did not know there was any such bill here. I know that great frauds have been constantly perpetrated growing out of transportation by water. I could state some most extraordinary cases that have occurred, some of which I understand are now under consideration and are being passed upon by a simple clerk in the quartermaster's department—cases of controversy between the Government and contractors, owners of vessels, and men who executed the charter-parties. If, however, the committee who have charge of the bill do not think it advisable to extend it so as to cover cases of that character, I am not going to insist upon it.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that this bill will not be passed at this time. I did not anticipate that it would be brought up to-day, and I desire an opportunity to examine it. I am not satisfied that such a bill as this ought to pass at this time; and I ask the Senator who has charge of the bill to postpone it and fix some definite time when it can be taken up and considered. I think it is a very important bill, and it needs examination and consideration before the Senate decide to pass it.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to the bill being laid over to some future day, if it can be an early day, and we can have a time fixed when we can take it up. It is a bill which, if passed at all, should be passed soon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Say next Tuesday at one o'clock.

Mr. POLAND. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to take up a little bill of which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] has charge, and which will give rise to no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate is not yet disposed of. Does the Senator from Vermont make a motion in regard to it?

Mr. POMEROY. I move that its further consideration be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. Do not make it a special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it go over simply, without making it a special order. The Senator will get it up just as well.

Mr. POLAND. If Senators desire it, I have no objection to that course. Let it go over generally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. RAMSEY. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 176) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States, to allow him pay as a commander from the 16th of July, 1862, in the same way and manner as if the order discharging him from the naval service had never been issued.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL SOCIETY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 253.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the title of it?

Mr. POMEROY. "A bill to incorporate the Congressional Society of Washington."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to create Oliver O. Howard, Silas H. Hodges, Daniel L. Eaton, Henry A. Brewster, Charles H. Bliss, Ezra L. Stevens, Benjamin F. Morris, Daniel Tyler, Llewellyn Deane, S. C. Pomeroy, and Calvin S. Mattoon, and their associates, a body-politic and corporate by the name of the First Congressional Society of Washington, with all the powers incident to corporations and usually enjoyed by them, and such as are requisite to enable them to sustain religious worship in Washington, in the District of Columbia, and to erect and maintain edifices for that purpose, and parsonages; and the society are to be exempt from any taxes to be assessed upon their property, under the authority of Congress or of the District of Columbia or the city or county of Washington.

Mr. POMEROY. While I sympathize fully with the society, I move to strike out the name of "S. C. Pomeroy" from the list of incorporators. I did not know that that name was in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The name will be stricken out at the suggestion of the Senator, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in. Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire what committee reported this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask that question with a view of inquiring whether or not this bill is drawn in accordance with the usual acts of incorporations of this description. I understand that it exempts the property of this church to any extent that they may own property in the District from taxation.

Mr. POMEROY. The exemption from taxation is limited "to sufficient property to enable them to sustain religious worship."

Mr. JOHNSON. How much will be sufficient for that purpose?

Mr. GRIMES. All I desire is, that they shall stand on the same footing with other religious denominations. I do not know whether this bill is in accordance with the practice in granting these acts of incorporation or not.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who had charge of it, is out of the Chamber at this moment.

Mr. RIDDLE. I will state that this bill was thoroughly examined by the committee, and it is in accordance with the other bills incorporating these churches, and is not excessive at all. It is the intention of the committee at some future day to draw up a general bill allowing religious societies to come in and be incorporated as is customary in the States.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not draw the bill, but I understand it is copied from the bill incorporating the Presbyterian churches in this city.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does it limit the amount of the property?

Mr. POMEROY. Not in dollars and cents.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it limited by feet and acres?

Mr. GRIMES. There is no limit in the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON. There ought to be a limit, certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill authorizes them "to purchase, hold, and convey real and personal estate, make contracts," &c., to such an extent "as to enable them to sustain religious worship in Washington, in the District of Columbia, and to erect and maintain edifices for that purpose, and parsonages; and said society shall be exempt from any taxes to be assessed upon their property, under the authority of Congress or of the District of Columbia or of the city or county of Washington."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a departure, if my friend will permit me to say so, from the policy that Maryland has always adopted, and the policy which I think has been adopted by most of the States. We limit the amount of property that these corporations shall hold by constitutional provision, subject only to the qualification that the Legislature may authorize a larger amount to be held than the constitution by its terms authorizes. Under this bill, it would be exceedingly difficult to limit the quantity or value of real estate which this corporation may hold.

Mr. GRIMES. Say "not to exceed one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that. I will move to add as a proviso to the first section, the following:

Provided, That the amount of the value of real estate shall not exceed one hundred thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That proviso will be added by common consent to the bill, if there be no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD, EASTERN DIVISION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, which was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the time for commencing and completing the Northern Pacific railroad, and all its several sections, is extended for the term of two years.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

UNIFORM MILITIA.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 262) to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia and organizing an active volunteer militia force throughout the United States. With the permission of the Senate, I desire to say a single word before the motion is put on taking up the bill.

The bill has been prepared with the greatest possible care. The first nine sections of the bill take the place of the act of 1792, which is not at all applicable to our present militia system, and to which very little attention is paid. The residue of the bill, eleven sections, provides for the organization of an active militia force, which, if full, would make a force of about two hundred and forty thousand men in the whole country. The bill was submitted to several eminent officers of the Army, to General Grant, General Sherman, General Meade, and General Thomas, who examined it very carefully, made one or two slight suggestions, and stated that the bill would accomplish the object desired, to have a small, effective, well-organized, active militia force in the country, and recommended it very strongly. Several of the most eminent men connected with the Army and the militia of the country have indorsed it.

The present is a good time, as we are just at the end of a war, to bring into the militia many officers of eminence who have distinguished themselves during the war. The bill allows the establishment in each State of a number of regiments, containing from six hundred to a thousand men, equal to the number of Representatives in Congress of that State; so that the number of regiments in the country will be equal to the number of Representatives in the Congress of the United States. It seems to me that we require such a volunteer militia force; and I should like to take the bill up now and put it on its passage. The bill is so carefully and well prepared that I see that the Committee on the Militia of the House of Representatives have adopted it as their own, with two or three amendments upon it. They have killed the Army bill in the House of Representatives, and it seems to me this much we ought, at any rate, to do. I know that there is a desire to go into executive session early to-day, and that there is a large amount of business in executive session, but I should like to have this bill taken up now and call attention to it that Senators may be willing to take some little time to act upon it. I therefore move to take it up for consideration at the present time.

Mr. GRIMES. I will not undertake to controvert the many merits which the Senator has suggested as being embodied in his militia bill, but I think most of the Senators present will agree with me that whether it be meritorious or not, now is not the proper time to proceed to the consideration of so important a bill when there are not more than ten or a dozen members present. It is true that the House of Representatives have killed their Army bill, as the Senator has said, and I congratulate the House and the country upon the fact. If they will now only kill the Army bill we sent to them they will have accomplished an object equally as great and good, I think, for we have now a large Army, fifty thousand men, being one half more than we can keep full, and I know of no necessity for increasing the Army. If it be in order I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POLAND. Before that is done I hope the Senator will allow me to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GRIMES. I withdraw the motion for the present in order to enable the Senator from Vermont to make his motion.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POLAND. On my motion yesterday the vote by which the Post Office appropriation bill was passed was reconsidered, I desire now to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the bill offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] was adopted, so as to bring the whole subject before the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator not to take up that matter now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate reconsider its vote adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the bill indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. I do not ask that the motion be considered now; I desire only to have it entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 391) to create the office of surveyor general in Idaho Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of Charles Brewer & Co.;

A bill (H. R. No. 556) to authorize the issuing of a military land-warrant to Frederick Berlin, assignee of the heirs of Peter Hess, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 557) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia;

A bill (H. R. No. 558) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish, for carrying the United States mail from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 391) to create the office of surveyor general in Idaho Territory—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of Charles Brewer & Co.—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 556) to authorize the issuing of a military land-warrant to Frederick Berlin, assignee of the heirs of Peter Hess, deceased—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 557) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 558) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish for carrying the United States mails from Boise City to Idaho City—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I now renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after two hours spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 4, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BRYNOR.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a correction of the Journal of Wednesday, as well as of the Globe. I find myself recorded on the passage of the Army bill as absent and not voting. I was present and voted in the negative. I have just learned of the error, or would have asked to have the correction made yesterday.

The Journal was corrected accordingly.

EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution relative to the recent attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States of America has learned with deep regret the attempt made upon the life of the Emperor of Russia by an enemy of emancipation. The Congress send their greeting to his Imperial Majesty and to the Russian nation, and congratulate the twenty million serfs upon the providential escape from danger of the sovereign to whose head and heart they owe the blessings of their freedom.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GRINNELL demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 43.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GRINNELL and ANCONA were appointed.

The House was again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine, more than one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 0, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Dejos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Monilton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Seefeldt, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—124.

NAYS—0.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Bergen, Blaine, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Dumont, Eggleston, Furusworth, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Loan, Marvin, McIndoe, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Schenck, Shanklin, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—59.

So the joint resolution was passed unanimously.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANCONA stated that, in deference to wishes of friends, he would change his vote, and vote in the affirmative, although against his own conviction of propriety.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the internal revenue bill, as modified by the Committee of Ways and Means, with additions including further subjects, and with errors corrected, may be ordered to be reprinted, and that as reprinted, it shall be taken up on Monday next.

It was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ANCONA. I would inquire whether this will include the extra copies ordered some days since; if not, whether the same number of copies of the corrections should not be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. It will not extend to the extra copies, because those are already printed. Mr. ANCONA. But a small portion of them, I believe. I suggest an amendment, that it embrace the extra copies remaining that have not been printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I think they have all been printed, but I see no objection.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the same number of extra copies of the corrected bill be issued. It is very necessary that this bill should be distributed among our constituents.

The SPEAKER. That goes to the Committee on Printing under the law.

MILITARY AND NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present action a joint resolution which I am sure will commend itself to the justice of every member of the House so that there will be no objection. It is in relation to the ages at which young men who have served in the Army or Navy during the late rebellion shall be eligible to appointment to the Military and Naval Academies. A provision relating to the Military Academy was embodied in the Army bill which has recently been before the House. I awaited the result of the action of the House on that bill before offering this resolution. But inasmuch as it may be some time before final action is had on that measure, and cases are arising daily, and many must arise before the 1st of July next, so that this measure will be of practical importance to the country, I sincerely hope the House will now take action upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will object to it if it gives rise to discussion, not otherwise.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that those who have performed meritorious service in the United States Army as officers or enlisted men, for a period of not less than two years during the late rebellion, shall be eligible to appointment to the United States Military Academy until twenty-four years of age, and to the Naval Academy until twenty-one years of age; and all persons who have performed such service for a period of less than two years shall be eligible to appointment to the Military Academy until twenty-three years of age, and to the Naval Academy until twenty years of age.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object unless the gentleman will agree to put in the word "white."

Mr. PAINE. That amounts to an objection to the introduction of the resolution.

CORRECTIONS OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. ALLISON. I see by reference to the Globe that my name is not recorded upon the final vote on the bill to admit the State of Colorado. I voted in the negative. I ask to have the Journal corrected accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I am recorded as not having voted on the admission of Colorado. I voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

Mr. PERHAM. I am also recorded as not voting on the passage of that bill. I voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted certain correspondence of the Secretary of State with the British minister, on the subject of the claim of Thomas Miller and William Fisher, British subjects, on account of alleged illegal arrest; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a correspondence relative to the claim of Charles Allen, a British subject, for compensation for injury done to his property near Vicksburg, received April 27, 1866; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, the Committee for the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of bill of the House No. 404, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Guardian Society, and provide for reforming juvenile offenders in the District of Columbia;" also, an act entitled "An act granting certain privileges to the Guardian Society of the District of Columbia;" and the same were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. COOK. I am instructed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the habeas corpus bill to make a report, which I ask to have read.

The report was read, and is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses of Congress on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives concur in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh amendments of the Senate.

That the House of Representatives concur in the sixth amendment of the Senate, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all after the word "act" in the fourth line of said amendment.

DANIEL CLARK,
LYMAN TRUMBULL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BURTON C. COOK,
SAMUEL MCKEE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COOK. I demand the previous question on the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

Mr. ANCONA called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union;

An act to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and the other West India islands, and the Bahamas; and

An act concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

CHARLES BREWER AND COMPANY.

The House resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of a bill for the relief of Charles Brewer & Co., which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour on Friday last.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles Brewer & Co., of Boston, Massachusetts, the sum of $3,520, in full for the passage in the Hawaiian bark Kamehameha, of sixty-eight destitute seamen belonging to American vessels which were burned by the Anglo-confederate pirate Shenandoah, from the island of Ascension to Honolulu.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF PETER HESS, DECEASED.

Mr. ECKLEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of a military land-warrant to Frederick Berlin, assignee of the heirs of Peter Hess, deceased.

The bill was read a first and second time.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue to Frederick Berlin, as the assignee of the heirs-at-law of Peter Hess, deceased, a military land-warrant for forty acres of land in lieu of military land-warrant No. 17,308, heretofore issued to Peter Hess, deceased, in his life-time, but which was not located.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ECKLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEYOR GENERAL FOR IDAHO.

Mr. ECKLEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 391, to create the office of surveyor general in Idaho Territory.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It provides that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be authorized to appoint a surveyor general for the Territory of Idaho, who shall be allowed an annual salary of $3,000, with the same power, authority, and duties as those provided by law for the surveyor general of Oregon; and to have a proper allowance for clerk hire, office rent, and fuel, not exceeding that allowed by law to the surveyor general of Oregon, the office to be located at Boise City, Idaho Territory.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ECKLEY,] what is the ordinary salary of a surveyor general of a new Territory?

Mr. ECKLEY. The salary of the surveyor general of each of the two districts out of which this is made is $3,000 a year.

Mr. UPSON. I know that the salary of the surveyor general of the Territory of Dakota was $2,000 a year; whether there was or not much land there capable of being surveyed.

Mr. ECKLEY. I do not know how that is. The surveyor general does not survey the lands.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ECKLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOSCOL RANCH, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 260, to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Soscol ranch, in California," with a recommendation that it do not pass; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUING OF LAND PATENTS.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, also reported back House bill No. 67, to authorize the issue of patents for lands in certain cases, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND TITLES IN BENICIA, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, also reported a bill to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia, California.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read in full. It provides that the right and title of the United States to the lands situated within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia, California, as defined in the act incorporating said city, passed by the Legislature of the State of California April 24, 1851, shall be relinquished and granted to that city upon trust that so much of said lands as is in the bona fide occupancy of parties by themselves or their assignees upon the passage of this act shall be conveyed to such parties by the city; provided that this relinquishment and grant shall not extend to lands occupied by the United States as a military depot, or to lands heretofore reserved by the United States for public purposes; that this grant shall not interfere with or prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to any part of said land, or preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof; and provided further, that said city shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, at the office of the sub-Treasurer at San Francisco, for the land the title to which is hereby granted and relinquished, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, within one year of the return to the General Land Office at Washington of an approved plat of the exterior limits of said city in connection with the lines of the public surveys.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman from California [Mr. McRUER] if the value of land in the city of Benicia is only $1 25 an acre.

Mr. McRUER. I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] that the city of Benicia was built upon what was considered private land. It was upon what is termed the Soscol ranch, the title to which was confirmed by the land commissioners appointed by Congress to examine land claims in California. That decision was afterward confirmed by the United States district court of California. But after a succession of years, upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the decision was reversed, and the original Mexican grant rejected upon what are considered to be technical grounds. Therefore the parties who seek the right to purchase this land from the United States at $1 25 per acre, have already paid various prices for it, some of them perhaps as high as $1,000 per acre, and even higher. These individuals have made purchases in good faith, and have paid a valuable consideration, upon the belief that the property purchased was private property; and it is deemed an act of justice that they should have the right to enter their lands at the rate of $1 25 per acre, and get a title from the United States.

I think there can be no objection to the passage of the bill, and I demand the previous question.

Mr. ECKLEY. I trust the gentleman will withdraw for one moment the call for the previous question, as I desire to strike out the last proviso of the bill.

Mr. BIDWELL. I trust that that amendment will be made.

Mr. McRUER. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ECKLEY.]

Mr. ECKLEY. I move to amend by striking out the following:

And provided further, That the said city shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, at the office of the sub-Treasurer at San Francisco, for the land the title to which is hereby granted and relinquished, at the rate of $1 25 per acre within one year of the return to the General Land Office at Washington of a private plat of the exterior limits of said city, in connection with the lines of the public surveys.

Mr. McRUER. I have no objection to that, if there is no opposition to it on the part of the House. I consider it an act of equity to the residents of the city of Benicia; but I desire that the passage of the bill shall not be prejudiced for the sake of this small sum of money.

Mr. ECKLEY. I think there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BIDWELL. I trust there will be no opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McRUER. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. ECKLEY was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENICIA, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 269, entitled "An act for the relief of citizens of Benicia, in Solano county, State of California," with a recommendation that it do not pass; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A. L. GOODRICH AND N. CORNISH.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Postmaster General be authorized to audit and settle, as to him may appear just and equitable, the demand of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish for carrying the United States mail on route 16001, from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho, from the 5th day of July, 1864, until the 1st day of July, 1865.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WELLINGTON AND DORSEY.

Mr. McRUER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill No. 210, for the relief of Wellington & Dorsey, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SANITARY CONDITION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By direction of the Committee for the District of Columbia, I desire to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 121) to place funds in the hands of the Commissioner of Public Buildings for sanitary purposes, and that the House proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution at the present time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] I believe, proposes to make some amendments to the bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did; but upon inquiry, I find that the city of Washington has appropriated more money for the purpose of cleaning the streets and alleys than this resolution proposes to appropriate; that the city corporation has done its full share toward putting the city in a proper sanitary condition, and that the sum proposed to be appropriated by the joint resolution is no more than will be required for putting the avenues in a proper condition. I do not therefore propose any amendment. If my colleague proposes any I am ready to hear it.

Mr. BEAMAN. Is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois in order now?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. EDWARD COOPER, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed an act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 388, to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia, with amendments.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BEAMAN. Is that a private bill? I raise the point of order that it is not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is a private bill. And as this raises entirely a new point, the Chair will ask to be indulged in explaining it.

There is no decision in Barclay's Digest as to what are private bills as distinguished from public bills. It does not appear that there has ever been an appeal from the decision of the Chair on that point. On examination, it has been found that the ruling of the Chair as to whether a bill was a private or a public bill has uniformly been acquiesced in.

It is evident that appropriation bills, Army bills, bankrupt bills, and other bills of that character, are public bills, while pension bills, claims for damages, claims of incorporated companies, and all bills of every kind from the Court of Claims, are, under the rule, private bills; but there is a middle ground between these bills where the character of the bill depends upon usage. A number of years ago Mr. Speaker Cobb decided that a bill granting lands to a railroad in Georgia was a private bill, but that decision has not been followed by any of those who have followed him as Presiding Officer of this House. It has been correctly held that railroad land grants were public bills.

Bills in reference to the District of Columbia have been reported both as public and private. The Statutes-at-Large are full of them under the heading of private bills, which is of course collateral evidence. As there is no decision in our own Digest, the Chair has examined into the parliamentary practice of Great Britain, where there is a marked distinction, growing out of the fact that fees have to be paid upon private while none are paid upon public bills.

In May's Parliamentary Practice (edition of 1859, pages 612 and 613) it is laid down, with a number of illustrations, that bills relating to London only are private bills, while those relating to the whole metropolis "have been dealt with as public bills; the large area, the number of parishes, the vast population, and the variety of interests concerned constituted them measures of public policy rather than of local interest." Bills establishing a police force in the city of London, improving Smithfield market, &c., were regarded as private bills, while the metropolitan cattle market and a metropolitan police were legislated on as public bills.

From these illustrations it is evident that while bills relative to and confined in their operation to the city of London are held in the British Parliament to be private bills, those embracing in their sphere the whole metropolis, including Lambeth, Mary-le-bone, Southwark, and Finsbury, with their millions of inhabitants and their vast area, are considered public.

There is also a decision in the second volume of Hatsell, which the Chair has not here at this moment, made by the Speaker of the House of Commons in 1807, that a bill for amending the highways of three counties was a private bill, because, as the Speaker said, it being "only" for three counties it was by all former precedents not a public bill.

The usage has been here that bills confined strictly in their operation to the District of Columbia can be reported as private or as public bills. The bill reported a few weeks ago for the incorporation of an ice company in this District was clearly a public bill, because it authorized agencies and the transaction of business in other places outside of the limits of this District. This bill appears to be confined to the District of Columbia, and can therefore be reported as a private bill on this day.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would a bill in reference to suffrage in this District be a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It would not. Private bills relate generally to individuals or corporations. The same volume of May's Parliamentary Practice states that private bills "are for the interest of an individual, a public company or corporation, a parish, a city, a county, or other locality." It must not be a general bill in its enactments, but "a bill for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons." As an illustration, a pension bill for the relief of a soldier's widow is a private bill, but a general bill granting pensions to any class of such persons as a class instead of as individuals is a public bill. So far as the reading has progressed, the Chair infers the pending bill is confined to this District.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of the bill.

The amendments of the committee were read and adopted, as follows:

On page 3, line six, add "necessary for the construction of said road," and in line sixteen strike out the word "inhabitants" and insert "citizens."

On page 5, line forty-nine, at the end of the section, insert, "which courts shall have the same jurisdiction and powers over the subject-matter as the said circuit courts have under the act aforesaid."

On page 7, line four, strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve," and in line fourteen, same page, after the word "and" insert the word "any."

Mr. McCULLOUGH. By the act of incorporation this company have a right to make lateral roads, provided they do not extend beyond the limit of twenty miles. This bill gives them a right to make from some point twelve miles below Washington a lateral road into the city of Washington.

Mr. ROSS. I move as an amendment to strike out "four years" and insert "two years," and also to strike out "six years" and insert "four years." I think they should be limited to two years to commence and four years to finish the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOWARD INSTITUTE AND HOME.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 482, to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home of the District of Columbia, with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was read. It constitutes James M. Edmunds, and others, a body-politic for the establishment of the said Institute for the instruction of freedmen, and fit them for independent support, furnishing also a temporary home for the sick.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 510, to incorporate the Academy of Music of Washington city, with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was read. It constitutes Max Strakosch, and others, incorporators, and fixes the capital at $500,000, in shares of fifty dollars each.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company, recommending its passage.

The bill was read. It increases the stock of the company $500,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 338, to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The bill was accordingly laid on the table.

J. W. NYE.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the Committee for the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the papers relating to the claim of J. W. Nye, assignee, &c.; and the same were referred to the Committee of Claims.

NATIONAL THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 352, to incorporate the National Association to Educate Colored Men for the Christian Ministry, with a substitute, recommending that the substitute be adopted.

The substitute was read. It creates Abraham D. Gillette, and others, a body-politic for the establishment of a national theological institute to educate persons for the Christian ministry. It provides that no person shall be excluded from the institute on account of theological belief.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WELKER, the title was amended so as to read, "An act to incorporate the National Theological Institute."

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and the title amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEVY COURT OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back bill of the Senate No 90, enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill empowers the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to declare and locate as public highways such roads known and used as "military roads" in the District of Columbia during the rebellion, as the court may deem advisable.

It provides further, that the damages which the owners of land may sustain shall be assessed as provided for in section three of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1812, "conferring certain powers on the levy court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois what provision the law of 1812 makes for the payment of the damages when assessed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It makes provision that the damages be assessed by a jury of twelve citizens of the vicinage, and the money is to be paid before the use of the road is entered on.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. From what source do they get the fund from which to pay the damages?

Mr. INGERSOLL. From the fund raised by the county taxes out of the county treasury. No part of it comes out of the Government funds.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFORM SCHOOL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with sundry amendments, bill of the House No. 379, to establish in the District of Columbia a reform school for boys.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. PAINE. I have so modified the joint resolution which I offered this morning that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has withdrawn his objection, and I now ask unanimous consent to introduce it.

The joint resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all persons who have performed meritorious services as officers or enlisted men in the Army of the United States for a period of not less than two years during the late rebellion, shall, if possessing the other qualifications now prescribed by law, be eligible to be appointed to the Military Academy of the United States until twenty-four years of age; and all persons who have performed such services for a period of less than two years shall, if possessing the other qualifications now prescribed by law, be eligible to appointment to said Military Academy until twenty-three years of age.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I like it as far as it goes, but I think it ought to go further.

Mr. PAINE. The only objection I have to the reference is, that unless this joint resolution is soon passed, candidates who are best qualified of all may be ineligible for the appointments to be made before the 1st of next July on account of age. A case of that kind may occur in my own district.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to my friend that he ask leave for the committee to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I promise him that it shall be reported back within three days, if the House will allow.

Mr. GARFIELD. The appointments are not to be made until the 1st of July.

Mr. SCHENCK's motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the committee to report it back at any time.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. DEMING called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 3, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, ordered to be printed, and the further consideration postponed to Tuesday, the 17th day of April, and made a special order after the morning hour.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the grade of "General of the Army of the United States" be, and the same is hereby, revived; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a General of the Army of the United States, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who being commissioned as General may be authorized, under the direction and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

The second section provides that the pay and emoluments of the General commissioned as hereinbefore provided shall be increased one half in amount, whether in money or in kind, over and above the amount allowed to a lieutenant general; and the said General may appoint upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the chief of staff to the Lieutenant General shall, during the existence of this act, be the chief of staff to the General.

The third section provides that whenever any general shall have been appointed and commissioned under the provisions of this act, if thereafter the office shall become vacant, this act shall thereupon expire and remain no longer in force.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section two, after the enacting clause, and the whole of section three, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the pay proper of the General shall be $400 per month, and his allowances in all other respects shall be the same as were allowed to the Lieutenant General by the second section of the act approved February 29, 1864, entitled "An act reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army," and the said General may select for his chief of staff a brigadier general from among the officers of the Army holding that rank; and may appoint upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] whether the amendment proposed by the Military Committee increases the pay of the officers of the Army above what it was during the war.

Mr. DEMING. The amendment proposed by the committee decreases very materially the pay provided by the bill originally referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It makes the pay of general but $180 per month, or $1,560 per year, more than that of lieutenant general; and if the gentleman had waited a few moments he would have heard the explanation of all the provisions of the bill which I propose to give the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I should be glad to hear the reasons for the increase of pay.

Mr. DEMING. I call the previous question upon the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. DEMING. I will hear it read.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to offer the following as a proviso:

Provided, That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of lieutenant general, by promotion or otherwise, the vacancy shall not be filled until after the death or resignation of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott; and thereafter there shall be but one lieutenant general.

Mr. DEMING. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will tend very seriously to embarrass this bill. And as he can have an opportunity of offering that same amendment to another military bill which will provide for the office of lieutenant general, I would prefer that he reserve it until then.

Mr. STEVENS. If I thought for a moment that the amendment I propose would tend to embarrass this bill, I would not offer it. But it is for the purpose of making the bill more likely to satisfy the House that I have offered it.

Mr. DEMING. Very well; I am perfectly willing that the sense of the House shall be taken upon the amendment.

The question was upon the amendment proposed by Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Speaker, the bill, as amended upon recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs, is so plain in its provisions and in its purpose that it hardly requires a formal explanation, and I certainly should not enter into one on this occasion except for certain objections made to me in private conversation which indicate that members misapprehend not only the limitations of this amended bill but also the previous legislation of Congress upon the grade of general.

The bill, as amended, creates the grade of general as a permanent part of the military establishment of this country. It provides also for his allowances, his staff, and his pay. The allowances in this bill to a general and the staff are precisely those which are provided in the bill creating the grade of lieutenant general. The pay proper, that is to say, the money pay, of the General is increased by this bill over that of a lieutenant general from $270 per month, which is now the pay of a lieutenant general, to $400 per month; thereby increasing the pay of a general over that of a lieutenant general $130 per month, or $1,560 per year.

The monthly receipts of the Lieutenant General now, from all sources under the act creating the office, are $1,340. The monthly receipts of the General from all sources under this bill will be $1,470—making the increased pay of the General over that of the Lieutenant General, as I have already stated, $130 per month. The yearly receipts of the Lieutenant General from all sources, including allowances, commutations, rations, forage, and every thing, are $16,080 per annum. The yearly receipts of the General from all sources, under this bill, will be $17,640, an increase of $1,560 per annum in favor of the General over the Lieutenant General. And this is the sole increase of pay or emoluments or allowances or rations or any thing else proposed by the bill which I am instructed to report.

In the second session of the Fifth Congress, the first under John Adams, in consequence of our dissensions with the French republic a provisional army was authorized, and the grade of lieutenant general was for the first time in our history created for its commander and conferred upon General Washington. It was accepted by him upon the express stipulation that he should not be called into service until the exigency for which the office was made, an invasion of the United States by France, should actually occur. During the recess which followed the adjournment it was understood that General Washington was not entirely pleased with his new rank, because in his opinion it was inferior to that which he had held in the revolutionary war as General and Commander-in-Chief. In deference to these scruples, when the same Congress held its third session, it authorized the President to appoint and commission an officer who should be styled "General of the armies of the United States." I have not been able to discover that the appointment under this power was ever made, and a presumption is raised that it was not by a return from the War Department in 1800, where General Washington is still registered as Lieutenant General, with the mournful affix "dead," a mere formal entry, but vividly suggesting, in connection with a name so illustrious, that—

"The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

I had rested on this conviction until this morning, when happening to take up the Annals of Congress for 1801, I found in the resolves passed by Congress on the death of Washington, which occurred on the 10th of December, subsequent to the last act to which I have alluded, he is hailed by the resolutions as "General of the armies of the United States," the precise language of the statute creating the grade of general. Whether this title was ever conferred upon him or not, it is unquestionably true that unless the apprehension of a war with France had subsided or his own death had intervened, he would doubtless have been General of the armies of the United States.

The theory of the organization of the higher grades of our Army evidently demands a general to complete and round off symmetrically the ascending scale of rank and authority. The appropriate command of a brigadier general is a brigade, of a major general a division, of a lieutenant general an Army corps, while to complete the system an officer of higher rank and of more comprehensive power and ability is required, who, unchallenged, may direct and supervise and impart unity and concert of plan and purpose to the operations of all the armies in the field.

And this theory is confirmed, without an exception, by the practice of the master nations of Europe, who, in the severe school of gigantic and protracted war, have learned military wisdom. It may be safely said that there is not a prominent nation in the world whose army organization does not culminate either in a general or a marshal. Prussia, with a peace establishment in 1863 of 210,675 men, had, in the same year, 68 major generals, 61 lieutenant generals, 34 generals, and two field marshals. Austria, with a peace establishment in 1863 of 263,825 men, had 308 major generals, 209 lieutenant generals, 42 generals, and three field marshals. England, with a total active regular force in 1863 of 192,583 men, had in 1864 186 major generals, 109 lieutenant generals, 68 generals, and five field marshals, the last grade being conferred only on royal personages, or general officers most distinguished for services in the field. France, with an army in 1862 of 467,357 men, had in 1861 292 generals of brigade, 175 generals of division, and 11 marshals of France.

But, Mr. Speaker, while this bill creating the grade of general commends itself to your favorable consideration by the symmetry and completeness it will impart to the graduated scale of rank in our Army, and while, too, it is vindicated by the example of those nations most distinguished for military ability and success, I cannot claim that in our present circumstances, when the Army has just triumphantly emerged from the most terrible contest which can ever assail the integrity of our flag without a general to command, and when we are now engaged in reducing it to the peace establishment, that either the symmetry of grade or the practice and example of other nations constitute an adequate argument for the passage of this bill.

I must admit that the chief claim which it presents for your approval is as a recognition and reward of the extraordinary services of the Republic's most successful and most illustrious defender; and I am therefore constrained in placing the bill upon its merits to refreshen your remembrance of the obligations of the country to him in many desponding hours of its recent extremity and peril. I trust the House will do me the justice to believe that while I should have never volunteered to rehearse to it his exploits I am still less disposed to shrink from such a rehearsal when imposed upon me as a duty, and when it is essential to a full and just appreciation of a measure I am instructed to report. I should greatly have preferred that this duty should have been committed to some gentleman more capable of "gilding refined gold" or of celebrating that merit which is universally acknowledged than myself. If General Grant's claims upon his country were either doubted or impugned I should rejoice to appear in his defense; but unless I greatly mistake the temper of this House upon the question of his exalted deserts, no discordant opinions or conflicting sentiments are to be harmonized here.

Perhaps, however, before entering into a review of his claims upon the nation, it may be proper and pertinent to briefly advert to the rewards which other times and other nations have bestowed upon transcendent military service and ability. Far, far back, at the very dawn of history, indeed upon the very first page of man's tempestuous annals, writ in faded hieroglyphs on crumbling columns, we read that long anterior to these most ancient records, war had absorbed nearly all the attention and activities of the race, and that the victorious warrior, from the necessities of a constantly threatened and embroiled society, became of course the king and founder of dynasties. Sesostris, Ramases, Pharaoh, and the great military chieftains who gave to Babylon and Assyria their imperial ascendancy, are the names of the Grants, the Shermans, and the Sheridans of that early day, promoted for martial service to an absolute sovereignty, transmissible by descent, over great empires. The war which for two lustrums raged round mighty Ilum was, you will remember, a war of kings who had acquired their scepters by previous prowess in the field. And to descend to later classic times, the names of Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, Epaminondas, will instantly occur to all as those of successful generals who were rewarded for military service by the chief civil position in their respective States; while the honors bestowed by Rome and Carthage on Cæsar and Hannibal illustrate the unbounded gratitude of those great martial nations to their defenders and deliverers.

Charlemagne won the iron crown with his sword. In the old régime of France the Luxembourgs, the Turennes, and the Condés, who reared and upheld the throne of the Bourbons, were invested with palaces, subsidies, and grants surpassing in splendor and magnificence the tales of enchantment or the dream of avarice. Even under the Empire dukedoms and royal titles and pomp were lavished by that large and warm imperial hand upon the successful general who pierced the enemy's center or bore the eagles triumphantly to the bristling crest of wavering battle, and gifts and estates were wrung from the nations they overran to maintain with more than oriental magnificence the dignity of the rank. England has always been prodigal of largesses to those who have vindicated her martial renown and extended her dominion. For the single victory of Blenheim, which dissolved the last coalition and broke the colossal power of Louis XIV, Marlborough was created a Prince of the Holy Roman Empire with the principality Middlesex attached, and upon his grand entrance into London was received with an ovation which reminded a classical spectator of those resplendent triumphs which swept over the Appian Way in the palmiest days of the mistress of the world. The extensive manor of Woodstock, once a royal palace—the scene of the loves of Henry II and the Fair Rosamond—was instantly conveyed to him in fee, and the royal comptroller was directed by the grateful Queen to rear for him the stately pile of Blenheim, which remains until to-day a splendid monument of the genius of the architect and the gratitude of a nation. For his subsequent victories an annuity of £5,000 a year charged upon the post office was settled upon him, and his dukedom, which was originally limited to his heirs male, was extended to his heirs female, "in order," as it was finely expressed, "that England might never be without a title which might recall the remembrance of so much glory." It has been estimated that the sum total of these grants exceeded five hundred thousand pounds.

Some of us can remember the Peninsular campaign; how with every packet we learned that the guns of the Tower were heralding some new triumphs of the English arms in Spain; how London was all ablaze with bonfires; how the Prince Regent at the opening of every Parliament announces some crowning victory of Wellington, and that he will raise him another step in the peerage, and solicits from his faithful Commons another hundred thousand pounds to sustain the style and dignity of the increased rank. Some of us remember that on the night when the news from Waterloo first reached Parliament £100,000 were instantly voted, and that the gratitude of the nation descended upon the Iron Duke in munificent grants and golden showers. Places, palaces, offices, and sinecures are fairly thrown at his feet. The aggregate of sums given to him, exclusive of salaries, exceeds £900,000, to say nothing of a snug little annuity of £2,000.

Our institutions it is said are popular, and that these regal benefactions are hostile to their genius and spirit, and yet the American people have not in the past been insensible to the claims of great military service to solid and substantial rewards, and have constantly solicited expressions of gratitude in harmony with the simplicity and frugality of our system. They rewarded General Washington for his military services in the Revolution by twice electing him to the Presidency. They rewarded General Jackson for his military services in the war of 1812 by twice electing him to the Presidency. It was his services in the same war which contributed vastly to the elevation of General Harrison to the same office, and but for his Mexican victories General Taylor never would have been President of the United States. The heroism of General Scott in two wars directed the attention of a great party to him as their candidate for the Presidency, and all parties united in conferring upon him the rank of lieutenant general as the only reward they could bestow upon his lifelong devotion to the defense and renown of our flag.

Now, I could safely challenge each one of this long line of heroes to come forth and present a claim upon national gratitude which cannot be met and overmatched by the claims upon us of that modest and reticent soldier who scattered the armies and destroyed the military power of a rebellion whose triumph would have buried the great republic of the world beyond the hope of resurrection. Tried by the criterion of success, who of them can present a brighter, fairer, more unsullied record? Tried by the interests at stake, upon which of their swords did interests so momentous hang? Tried by the valor of the adversary, who of them ever encountered a foe so worthy of his steel? If in the sad and disheartening summer of 1863 it had been asked you, what rank will you confer upon the general who silences the batteries at Vicksburg, that the Mississippi, through the bisected rebellion, might course unobstructed from the prairies to the Gulf; if it had been asked us at the close of the last session, what will you do for him who breaks the lines at Richmond and receives the sword of Lee, what soul in this House could have placed any limit or qualification upon its obligations?

Find a single martial enterprise in the whole history of mankind more serious in the obstacles to be overcome, more luminous as an example of heroism and endurance, more fatal to an enemy, more magnificent in its results, than the single enterprise of opening the Mississippi river; search the tide of time for a nation which was ever delivered from such depths and exalted to such a pinnacle of exultation by one single blow, as by that struck at Richmond in April last, which at the same time broke the head and paralyzed the extremities of the rebellion.

War has been defined to be contention by force for the purpose of crippling or overwhelming an enemy; and in glancing at the history of our war it seems to me that we had made but little progress even in crippling our enemy until the inflexible will and martial energies of General Grant entered as an animating and directing soul into the armies of the Republic. Prior to his conspicuous appearance upon the grand arena we had met with many reverses and a few successes, but the reverses were most depressing to the national spirit and the successes had hardly penetrated the hide of the defiant monster which was confronting us. War had surged and resurged with alternate triumph and defeat over the devoted plains of Missouri. We had gained a lodgment on the coast of South Carolina; we held the sand spits of Hatteras, and we had dearly purchased a strategical position on Roanoke Island. But in neither of these affairs had we succeeded in actually debilitating the enemy, and from neither of these points had we been able to penetrate the enemy's country much beyond the range of our cannon. The first decided success which let in a glimpse of sunlight and lifted the cloud of despondency and exhilarated the national heart were the brilliant operations upon the Tennessee and the Cumberland. When, following hard upon the capture of Fort Henry, the country learned that Fort Donelson, strongly fortified by nature and art, had surrendered with its garrison of sixteen thousand prisoners, and that large sections of Kentucky and Tennessee were redeemed from rebel thralldom, we asked, with all the vehemence of kindling gratitude, to whom are we indebted for a vigor of operations and an earnestness of purpose which prove that military enterprise and heroism are not obsolete, and that there is still some hope for our drooping flag, and we were told that he who could say to a rebel general, "No other terms than an unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted; I propose to move immediately upon your works," was one of those worthy beneficiaries whom the nation had educated at its great military school; that he had won his spurs in the earliest battles of the Mexican war; that he had participated in that series of hard-fought engagements which carried triumphantly the flag of the Republic from the shores of the Gulf to the lake-encircled citadel of the ancient Aztecs; that he had won his full grade of first lieutenant in those bloody hours when Molino del Rey succumbed to the impetuosity of our soldiery, and his brevet of captain on that day, ever memorable in our annals, when the steep and frowning heights of Chapultepec were carried, and the trembling city below implored the mercy of our artillery.

We were told that when the war was over, disgusted with the ennui which haunts a soldier on the peace establishment, he had resigned his commission as captain, but that when the rebellion struck the first tocsin he rushed to the defense of the flag under which he was trained and nurtured, and offered his services to Governor Yates, of Illinois; that he had organized the Illinois quota under the first call for troops; that, as colonel of the twenty-first regiment of that State, he had quelled the guerrillas in north Missouri; that he had risen rapidly to the grade of brigadier general; that he had destroyed a rebel magazine at Paducah; that he had wiped out Jeff. Thompson at Fredricton; that he had severely chastised a superior force of the enemy at Belmont; that he was a general who seemed to understand what war meant and what it did not mean; that in his judgment it did not mean lying in camp and garrison, drilling and organizing for ever and ever, but seeking the enemy, moving on his works, pushing and pounding until he gave way; and that when he did that you were not to wait for weeks and months for horses, shoes, transportation, but that you were to push on with such resources as you had; hang on his flanks like grim death, and if one expedient failed, try another and another until he was utterly routed and dissolved. In short, we were told that he was a positive man, of pluck and purpose and self-reliance, who did not believe, as some did, that Robert E. Lee was endowed by the supernatural powers with supernatural resources and strategy and ubiquity, or who did not fear, as some did, that he, with the entire army of Northern Virginia, could suddenly throw a somersault over intervening mountains and forests into our lines, but that, by butting and hammering away with mere human caution and skill and perseverance, the mightiest Paladin of treason could be outflanked or whipped.

Much criticism was expended at the time upon the battle of Shiloh; and that part of it which applies to the gaps and disconnections in our disjointed line of battle may be just. It was a vast mêlée between separate regiments, brigades, and divisions, each fighting on its own hook and for its own position, with but little concert of action and with but slight mutual support.

So far as the criticism applies to the violation of true principles of war by fighting that battle with his back to the Tennessee river, General Grant has broken his austere silence and condescended in characteristic strain to speak for himself. After the battle of Pittsburg Landing General Buell began criticising in a friendly way the impolicy of his having fought the battle with the Tennessee behind his men. "Where, if beaten, could you have retreated, General?" asked Buell. "I did not mean to be beaten," was Grant's sententious reply. "But suppose you had been defeated in spite of your exertions?" "Well, there were all the transports to carry the remains of the army across the river." "But, General," urged Buell, "your whole transports could not contain even ten thousand men, and it would have been impossible for them to make more than one trip in the face of the enemy." "Well, if I had been beaten," said General Grant, quietly lighting a cigar as he spoke, "transportation for ten thousand men would have been abundant, for that would have been more than would have been left."

And yet in one important respect it contributed more to the eventual success of our arms than any action in the war. It was the experimentum crucis which first tested the respective stamina and manliness of the two belligerents. It was the first hurling together of the two people upon a large scale in a hand-to-hand fight, and when the enemy retreated from that broken and gory field, he retreated with his arrogance tamed and his dream of invincibility dispelled forever. No southern soldier from that terrible day presumed to despise again the courage, the persistence, or the marksmanship of the adversary, for there was weeping and lamentation in every southern home.

I have already adverted to the vast importance to the national cause of the capture of Vicksburg. In those protracted operations, a war by itself, which culminated in the overthrow of that almost impregnable stronghold, it is difficult to discover what element or quality of a consummate commander General Grant failed to exhibit. Strategy? Why the conception of the new enterprise, after every conceivable plan had been tried and failed, was either an inspiration of strategical genius or the result of the most laborious strategical study. Labor, and perseverance? Why, the reconnaissances of the different bayous, creeks, passes, and rivers which he made in that amphibious region, the dredging which he executed, the canals which he dug to open a safe water passage below the city, are without parallel in resistance to natural obstacles, unless the parallel is found in the memorable expedition of Xerxes into the Peloponnesus, which channeled Mount Athos and bridged the Hellespont. Forethought? Why, every step of a seemingly desperate adventure was prearranged in his mind, and every contingency which could be anticipated provided for in advance. Presence of mind? Contingencies that could not be foreseen were upon the spur of the occasion as fully met as if they had originally been embraced within his plans. Courage? Did he not push his transports through an iron hail compared with which the full blast of Gibraltar or Cherbourg would be comparatively harmless? Persistence? Did he not again drive the same transports, riddled by their first ordeal, through the fortifications which spouted destruction from the bluffs of Grand Gulf; and did he not, after twenty consecutive days of fighting and five pitched battles, huddle the army of the Southwest into its lines and hold it there until it dropped into his arms as prey?

Let me here pause in this rapid sketch of General Grant's military career and permit him to recite the results of his operations at Chattanooga in the congratulatory order which he issued to his troops. I ask the Clerk to read the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS
MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI, IN THE FIELD.

CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, December 10, 1863.

The general commanding takes this opportunity of returning his sincere thanks and congratulations to the brave armies of the Cumberland, the Ohio, the Tennessee, and their comrades from the Potomac, for the recent splendid and decisive successes achieved over the enemy. In a short time you have recovered from him the control of the Tennessee river from Bridgeport to Knoxville. You dislodged him from his great stronghold upon Lookout Mountain, drove him from Chattanooga valley, wrested from his determined grasp the possession of Missionary Ridge, repelled with heavy loss to him his repeated assaults upon Knoxville, forcing him to raise the siege there, driving him at all points, utterly routed and discomfited, beyond the limits of the State. By your noble heroism and determined courage you have most effectually defeated the plans of the enemy for regaining possession of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee.

You have secured positions from which no rebellious power can drive or dislodge you. For all this the general commanding thanks you collectively and individually. The loyal people of the United States thank and bless you. Their hopes and prayers for your success against this unholy rebellion are with you daily. Their faith in you will not be in vain. Their hopes will not be blasted. Their prayers to Almighty God will be answered. You will go to other fields of strife; and with the invincible bravery and unflinching loyalty to justice and right which have characterized you in the past, you will prove that no enemy can withstand you, and that no defenses, however formidable, can check your onward march.

By order of
U. S. GRANT,
Major General.

Mr. DEMING. When General Grant first entered upon the general direction of affairs four new and controlling characteristics forthwith reformed, invigorated, and systematized our military administration—coöperation of purpose in our separated armies, energy in attack, rapidity in pursuit, and wisdom in the selection of the commanders of armies, corps, and divisions; the fit man for the fit place. I cannot, in this brief résumé of his services which I am attempting, but barely allude to the manner in which he combined the scattered and independent operations of our various armies in the field, concentrated upon a single point the entire military strength of the nation, and destroyed that damaging expedient by which the enemy in command of the interior lines of communication was enabled to reinforce any of his armies which were vigorously assailed. The campaign upon which the Lieutenant General first entered is admitted by the highest military critics to have been grand and perfect in its conception, contemplating the simultaneous movement and the joint action of four armies—the army of the Potomac, the army of the Cumberland, the army of Western Virginia, and the army of the James—each with a different objective point, but all contributing to the great purpose of the campaign, the destruction of the chief army of the rebellion.

If the plan partially failed, and what was designed to have been finished in the field was at length completed by a protracted siege, it was not due to any want of genius or merit in the plan or of skill and vigor in executing that part of it under the immediate supervision of the commanding general. No man can contemplate, without admiration and wonder, that hand-to-hand fight in the blind thickets of the bloody Wilderness, that persistent and inflexible advance against overwhelming natural obstacles, against a determined enemy intrenched in front, acquainted with every path and with every point of attack and resistance, in possession, too, of interior lines over which he could rapidly hurry his troops, and throw them impetuously in any direction. No one can contemplate without astonishment and sympathy the burden of labor, anxiety, and solicitude which he cheerfully bore during the immense labors of that protracted siege, and at its final success our thanks to Grant unconsciously mingled with our thanks to God.

For this crowning work alone, so important in its immediate results, and charged with ultimate consequences so momentous to liberty, civilization, and the human race, let gratitude unbounded, unmeasured, infinite, be freely tendered, and let substantial honor and reward be bestowed in some slight degree commensurate with the obligations of an emancipated and rescued nation.

I think I may safely invoke the favor of the Representatives of the people to the humble testimonial proffered by this bill. Let us not in this day of our deliverance paralyze future heroism and reaffirm before the civilized world the ingratitude of republics by refusing this small tribute to the foremost soldier of this generation; to him who, entering the war as captain, won in its battles every successive grade, and emerged from it with a rank unsurpassed in our service; to him who at Fort Donelson first lightened the despondency of a trembling nation; to him who at Shiloh first demoralized the spirit of the haughtiest of foes; to him who at Vicksburg first released the loyal Father of Waters from forced complicity with treason; to him who at Chattanooga first opened the gates of Georgia that Sherman might sweep from Atlanta to the sea and from the Savannah to the Cape Fear; to him who received the swords of Buckner, Pemberton, and Lee, and the capitulation of three great armies of the rebellion; to him who successfully conducted two of the most memorable sieges in history; to him, finally, who dissolved the confederacy at Richmond, and struck every rebel rag from the Rappahannock to the Rio Grande.

Time, it is said, devours the proudest human memorial. The impress we have made as a nation may be obliterated; our grandest achievements, even those which we now fondly deem eternal, those which embellish the walls of that historic Rotunda, may all drop from the memory of man; our civilization, liberty, arts, agriculture, though sculptured in the pediments of this Capitol, may all be engulfed in Lethe's dark waters; this massive structure, with its solid foundations, expanded wings, towering columns, and bubbling dome may all be buried with our Constitution, Government, laws, and polity, in a common grave, yet we shall not all perish. You may rest assured that three American names will survive oblivion, and soar together immortal: the name of him who founded, the name of him who disenthralled, with the name of him who saved the Republic.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I obey a perilous but resistless impulse when I attempt to add a single word to the eulogy upon General Grant to which we have just listened with so much delight. I do not rise to rehearse the story so well told; I do not rise to enforce by any additional argument the passage of the bill whose success has been already so thoroughly secured. That success was certain when the crowning reason for the presentation of the bill was stated by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I seek to do nothing more than to express my own sense of the transcendent services for which this House thus seeks to reward that distinguished general, and add a word, if possibly I may, with the indulgence of the House to the estimate of those services.

Such honors as this bill proposes to create, or if not to create, to revive anew for a higher and still greater occasion than that on which they were created, become the man on whose head they are to cluster. And whether you consider his private worth, his patriotism, his distinguished services in the field, or the attitude in which he stands to this great nation to-day, and will stand through all time to come, those honors cannot be greater than his desert. He has carried this nation through the great rebellion which menaced its existence. He has reestablished the integrity of the Union and the supremacy of the Constitution, which were threatened and endangered by this rebellion. He has established through all time to come the right of the people to govern themselves, the destruction of which right was involved in the overthrow of the only Government in which it is now embodied.

But, sir, even more than this, he has rendered the highest service any man can render his country; he has led the nation through these transcendent trials by which alone any nation ever reaches the first rank among the military Powers of the earth; for until a new nation passes successfully through the great crisis of a civil war she cannot claim a place among the foremost nations of the world. History shows that without such a trial no such conquest has ever been achieved. No nation has ever yet won for herself that foremost rank to which all ambitious Powers aspire, except through the discipline of civil strife and bloodshed.

When we plunged into this great contest it was without experience, without knowledge of the means and resources that we could command to carry it through, without knowledge of our own temper and courage to face the crisis, without compactness, or solidity, or any of the elements of strength so essential to success. General Grant, it is not too much to say, has shown us that we possessed them all. He has organized, disciplined, and welded them all, and carried the nation successfully through its great struggle. That, sir, is a service for which he will be remembered, not in this land alone, but in all lands where military prowess stands foremost, as it does in every civilized nation of the world.

For that we cannot give him too much of recognition or of honor. Nor will this nation ever forget that it owes to him, in all human probability, the perpetuity of the great system of government which this nation was ordained to establish among the nations of the earth and make perpetual and paramount over them all. And no words will sound his fitting eulogy; no words less gifted than those used by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] can properly and sufficiently describe the long career of his services, the long catalogue of victories he has won, and the honors he has heaped upon his native land.

I rejoice, sir, that this bill has been brought forward to do him honor. Would it were in our power to magnify, to increase, to augment to any extent the honors we would heap upon his name; for it is only by such recognitions from those they serve that the great men of any age ever meet their fitting reward.

I have listened, as I am sure we all have, with delight to the graphic recital by my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] of the rewards heaped by foreign nations upon those who served them. What honors crowned the career of Marlborough! What rewards in palaces, and dotations, and in everything else that a man or his family could prize, awaited the victorious Wellington when he returned from the Continent! What, in the face of such honors as these, can we present to those who have rescued this great nation of freemen from the peril with which their Government was threatened?

It is not, as has properly been said, the genius of our institutions to heap upon men undue material rewards, even for such distinguished services as these; but, certainly, this nation does not lack a grateful heart, even if its gratitude does not take the same form with that of other nations. We will give to General Grant, cheerfully, and with the heartiest acclamations of the nation he has served, everything that it is in our power to give. He shall walk from one end of the land to the other, so long as he shall walk the earth at all, honored and endeared to all as the savior of the nation, as the man who rescued from danger and destruction the priceless principle of self-government.

Ay, sir, unless gratitude shall fail, in coming generations nothing shall remind us of his name that does not remind us of his services; and when he shall die, and mingle his dust with the dust of our common earth, he shall descend to an honored grave covered with benedictions, covered with the glorious recollections of the services he has rendered, covered with everything that a grateful people can accumulate around his memory so as to perpetuate it to successive generations. This is his reward, if there can be any reward of national gratitude. This would suit, certainly, the quiet, the self-deprecating modesty of his noble and heroic character. And nothing more than this will be needed to satisfy him with what he has done, for he never sought anything but the consciousness that he was doing his duty, with all his energy and all his power.

Let this bill, then, sir, pass, as I am sure it will pass, by the unanimous and hearty vote of the House. And if there be anything else worthy of the nation's gratitude and of his acceptance let it be freely offered as the fitting testimonial of the service he has rendered the country and the honor he has heaped on the American name through all time to come.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, as I offered an amendment to this bill, I must say a word upon it. It would be in very bad taste, sir, for me to attempt to light my taper in the midst of these blazing luminaries which surround us. I shall not try it. My amendment proposes to reduce the expense of this movement by preventing, in case General Grant shall be promoted, the appointment of a lieutenant general until the death of General Scott, and then that but one shall be appointed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that amendment shall be adopted—and possibly without it I shall support this bill as a cheap and honorable method of expressing the nation's gratitude to one of her most illustrious defenders—the expense will be but slightly increased. I do not know that I much regard expense when we are seeking to honor and reward the Army of the United States.

I hope economical gentlemen will not be alarmed, but I believe that we ought largely to increase the pensions of our soldiers and their widows, and to increase their pay; and at the proper time it will give me pleasure to vote for such increase. But as has been well stated, how trifling is this present expense as compared with what has been bestowed by other nations upon their great commanders. I shall not attempt to recite what has been so eloquently and classically stated by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING.]

We all know that upon her victorious consuls Rome bestowed the spoils of provinces. England has given her one, two, and three million pounds sterling to her successful commanders—to Marlborough, to Nelson, to Wellington; and yet not one of them ever achieved results half as important to the nation or to the world as have been achieved by our great commander, through his calm, firm, determined, and able conduct.

I believe that the moral and physical courage, the patience and skill, the operations in every way which we have witnessed, indicate General Grant as one of the fittest men to command a great army and lead it to great results. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] in being willing not only to promote him to this office, but as I understood him, and I hope I do not misunderstand him, to a higher office whenever the happy moment shall arrive. [Laughter and applause.]

I hope I shall be excused if I have been led, in the light of this honor, so grand, to violate what I announced to be my purpose when I arose. I hope the amendment I have offered and this bill will be adopted.

Mr. DEMING. If no other gentleman desires to speak I will call the previous question.

Mr. McKEE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a few moments.

Mr. DEMING. Certainly; I will do so.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I am very loath to say anything on this question. But entertaining the opinions I do in regard to it, I feel inclined since this discussion has come up to make a few remarks.

I regret very much that I am compelled to differ with the gentleman who has charge of this bill, [Mr. DEMING,] and with those who have advocated its passage. I would not detract from in the least, nay, I would go further, if possible, and add to the honor and esteem which the people of our country entertain for this champion of our Army. There is no man in this country who holds him in higher regard than I do. But I must here enter my protest and raise my voice against what I conceive to be this following too much the precedents which have been set, not by Governments constituted like our own, but by Governments whose forms our forefathers threw off when they established our own.

For one, I do not desire at this day that my country should turn back and imitate ancient Greece or Rome in conferring these great honors upon her heroes. I would not that my own country should imitate despotic France in her adoration for her successful chieftains. I would not that my country should imitate the example of monarchical England in conferring vast emoluments upon those who have led her armies to battle.

I regard this bill as antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions, as anti-republican, as contrary to the genius which our forefathers instilled into our Government when they founded it. I have seen enough in my short experience of life of what I may fitly denominate the aristocratic element of our Army. I have seen that spirit in the men who held positions in our Army at the beginning of the rebellion through which we have just passed. I have seen it in the great struggle which our people have waged against those who endeavored by force to destroy the institutions of our land.

And the country will bear witness to the truth of my statement when I say that it is not to that element which the nation has fostered and nourished that we to-day are indebted for the fact that we have crushed out the most mighty rebellion the world has ever seen. It is to the people that we owe it; to those who have not been educated in arms; to those who have not received the fostering care of the Republic, who have not been supported and feasted upon the public Treasury, but who in their might, at the call of their country, by their patriotism and valor succeeded in crushing out this great rebellion against the institutions of our fathers. To them we owe it, and we owe to the leaders who led them a debt of gratitude which the nation is not slow to acknowledge, and which the people are ready and willing and anxious to pay. But we owe them nothing by way of emoluments; we owe them nothing by way of rewards.

If we desire to reward the men who have saved our country, let us begin with the maimed and wounded and suffering, who have periled their all in its defense, and who at the end of the war have no honor but their broken and disfigured limbs to carry to their graves.

I know this bill is but a small matter in the way of expenditure. It takes but about some twenty thousand dollars from the Treasury of the United States and confers it upon the leader of our armies; it is but a small affair. But the idea which weighs upon my mind is that this is contrary to the genius of our institutions—aping, if I may use the term, those old Governments of Europe whose whole theory is anti-republican, and whose example God forbid that my countrymen with my sanction should ever follow.

I am willing to reward our heroes. They have their reward in the gratitude which fills the heart of the nation. When the hero of this war travels, as the gentleman said, from one end of our country to the other, he is welcomed everywhere with the plaudits of a grateful people. They regard him as a man deserving great honor, and they give it to him. But I see no reason why we should establish this rank. It is not needed for the Army. It is not needed for the honor of the nation. The brave soldiers who followed their leaders through the war will not consider themselves flattered if this rank should be conferred. They do not ask that this new rank shall be created. The hero for whom this honor is proposed, though he would doubtless feel flattered by it, is, I am quite sure, too modest a man to desire this at the hands of his country.

I am sorry, sir, that I have felt compelled to say thus much. What I desire—and I may as well make the declaration here—is that this Government shall extend its fostering care and protection to those brave men who periled their all for their country, who have no honors to wear, and for whom we as a great Government should provide by pouring out our treasure liberally to them. I, for one, shall be ready to vote any amount within reason, either by way of bounties or pensions, to those brave men who have fought for our nation during the great struggle through which we have passed. But, sir, I do desire that my country, through her national Legislature, shall set to the world no example which would imply that a republican Government wishes to worship men as heroes.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker. I had hoped that there would be no discordant voice in this House upon the passage of this bill. I had trusted that at least in reference to this testimonial of our regard to so distinguished a character as Lieutenant General Grant there would be but one voice here among the people's Representatives.

I do not rise for the purpose of detaining the House, or saying anything in regard to the history of General Grant; for this has been done fully and ably by those who have preceded me. I desire, however, to state that I shall vote for the passage of this bill, because I believe it due as a testimonial of the nation's gratitude to General Grant. I honor him, sir, not only for his brilliant services in the field, but because of his magnanimity in the hour of triumph, and his genuine modesty. He has conducted himself throughout this war independent of party considerations or party intrigues, devoting himself to the vindication of the true honor of the country in maintaining the Constitution and preserving the Union. I trust, sir, that when the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill, it will be unanimous.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose when this bill came before the House to-day to say one word on the subject; but representing, as I do in part, the State of Kentucky, a portion of the country which during the war felt so much the necessity of national defense and aid, I feel it due to the occasion that I should in my humble way express, imperfect though it may be, the gratitude of the loyal people of that State to that great, that good, and that renowned man, Lieutenant General U. S. Grant.

I remember, sir—and I may be excused for alluding to it—that period in 1861, when the Legislature of Kentucky was in session and when the whole southern border of that State was threatened by an armed force seeking to overthrow and destroy the government of the State as well as the Government of the United States. At that time our people were divided. And, sir, when General Polk took possession of Columbus, General Grant, without authority from the Government, but acting on the convictions of his own judgment and with characteristic energy and promptitude, took possession of Paducah, thus saving Kentucky from the destructive power and control of the rebellion.

I remember when, on the 4th of July, the news was telegraphed to us that General Grant had captured Vicksburg, and when the people, looking to this and all else that he had done, rejoiced we had such a man as General Grant. Yes, sir, the nation owes it to him, and no men would be more proud of it than the soldiers who served under him.

This is a republican Government. General Grant, by his influence at the head of a great and good army, has secured to us an independent republican Government. The nation owes him the honor and should give it to him. Where is the man in Europe or on this continent who has done so much for republican liberty as General Grant? Where is the man who has done so much for freedom as General Grant? Where is the man who has lifted our flag higher and brought it back unsullied than General Grant? Where is the man with so much endurance and so much devotion? Where is the man beside General Grant who fought through wildernesses, through swamps, and snatched victory even from the valley of death?

It does me good to yield my tribute to this great general. If I had never seen him and only known him through the reports of his own soldiers who weep with delight when they talk of him, I would be glad to vote for this bill to-day.

I regret, sir, that a sentiment in this House to-day should come from my own State which is unwilling to give him that high credit which he deserves.

Mr. McKEE. I do not want the impression to go out, which might be inferred from the remark just made, that I am indisposed to give General Grant the credit which he deserves.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I presume this bill, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] has no partisan purpose, but is merely the expression of the Representatives of the people of the United States of the fidelity which the people attach to a great general of the country. I have always made it a principle of my life that those who have shown heroism and bravery, without regard to party, are and ought to be entitled to the respect and high consideration of the people they have defended and sustained.

I think I can say with certainty that upon this side of the House, which I partly represent, no one will disagree with the sentiments which have been urged here by those who have advocated the passage of this bill. But, sir, I feel that no stigma ought to be attached to any man in this House because he may disagree with the sentiments of others or what they believe the proper action of Congress should be in regard to soldiers of the Army. I am not here to find fault with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] because he cannot be able to agree with the views of a majority of this House in the votes they may cast on this question. I feel there is no more solemn duty resting on any member of Congress, regardless of what objections may be made to him politically, than to stand here and express what he sincerely believes, whether his views meet with the approbation of a majority of the whole people of this country or not.

In favoring this bill on my part I am moved by no consideration of party and with no object to advance in rank and eminence the Lieutenant General of this country above those who have participated with him in the many battles and victories which during the last four and a half years have taken place in our midst. I do not want to be understood in giving my vote for this bill that all our gratitude is to be centered in one man in the Army. I have not forgotten there are other able and illustrious generals in the Army entitled to the undying gratitude of the American people as well as those whose names appear in all that I have heard during this discussion. I suppose it will be the will of the President of the United States on the passage of this bill to give the commission contemplated in it to Lieutenant General Grant, as one who occupies the official position in the Army the highest of any, except it may be the President of the United States.

Sir, there is no man more willing than I to extend that gratitude to General Grant, because his heroism, his bravery, his patriotism, his fortitude, and his determination through this war have been unequalled in the history of the civilized world; but while he has shown this heroism and bravery, let us not forget the thousands and hundreds of thousands of men whom he led, of the men who faced the battlements of the enemy, of the men whose blood, whose valor, and whose patriotism equally consecrated the glorious victories which the American Army achieved during the bloody revolution through which we have just passed. It is a tribute which we owe, not only to General Grant, but to the men who followed him, to those whom he commanded, that while we extend to this brave and illustrious general the undying gratitude of the nation, we should at the same time extend to those brave and faithful soldiers the sentiment of respect and esteem which we cherish for every man who has engaged in this war for the suppression of the rebellion.

But, sir, General Grant has that which commends him to my respect much more than many others who were engaged in the war. I mean his Christian charity, his meekness, and his honorable manhood in granting to those whom he had subdued the rights which civilization demands shall be extended to an enemy that is at your feet.

When General Lee, whose ability I suppose will not be denied, as it never has been denied, by any gentleman on this floor, surrendered his sword to General Grant, it was handed back to him, as a manifestation of that Christian charity and goodness of heart which should characterize a true-hearted hero when his enemy is at his feet. General Grant was ready to extend to his conquered adversary those principles of civilized warfare which our fathers extended to their enemies in the bloody days of the Revolution.

But, sir, this is no new office that is proposed to be given, if I understand it. If my recollection serves me right, in reading the history of this country, General Washington occupied the same position that we now expect to be given to General Grant, or to such other general as the President of the United States in his wisdom may see fit. I believe that the mantle of the illustrious Washington may well fall upon the shoulders of General Grant. I believe that he has walked in the footsteps of the Father of his Country, and has shown an amiability of character and a tenderness of heart toward his foes that Washington did to those who had given aid and comfort to the followers and adherents of King George during the seven years of the revolutionary war.

Therefore it is with pleasure that I record my vote in favor of that hero, and I do it with a sentiment that it is not for him alone, but as a recommendation to the people of the country that they shall stand by those whose illustrious deeds of valor have been exhibited on the field of battle, whether as officers or soldiers, without distinction of rank or position.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of making a single statement in regard to a matter alluded to in the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. FINCK.] With exact justice and propriety, my colleague stated that in the services of General Grant there had appeared nothing of the partisan; that his public life was characterized by a devotion to his country without regard to partisan opinions or prejudices. The remark that I propose to make in connection with that is, that in no act in the life and service of General Grant, to my mind, is the sagacity and foresight of the distinguished Lieutenant General more plainly indicated than in the fact that nearly one month before the head of this nation had discovered that slavery must be stricken down before liberty could be saved, that great fact was announced by General Grant, and in terms fearless and distinct, the vigor of which startled the American mind at the time it was announced by this pioneer upon the great subject of emancipation. I undertake to say here, in the face of the nation, that the sagacity of the Lieutenant General as a military commander was nowhere more completely vindicated than it was in that foresight, that determined, and announced in advance, that policy which is contained in the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read—a letter which bears date nearly a month before the proclamation of emancipation.

The Clerk read as follows:

VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI, August 30, 1862.

DEAR SIR: * * * * * The people of the North need not quarrel over the institution of slavery. What Vice President Stephens acknowledges the corner-stone of the confederacy is already knocked out. Slavery is already dead and cannot be resurrected. It would take a standing army to maintain slavery in the South, if we were to make peace to-day, guaranteeing to the South all their former constitutional privileges. I never was an abolitionist; not even what could be called anti-slavery; but I try to judge fairly and honestly, and it became patent to my mind early in the rebellion that the North and South could never live at peace with each other except as one nation, and that without slavery. As anxious as I am to see peace established, I would not, therefore, be willing to see any settlement until this question is forever settled.

Your sincere friend,
Hon. E. B. WASHBURN.

U. S. GRANT.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to call the attention of the House to the recommendation of the committee in regard to striking out the third section of this bill. That section provides that this office shall terminate with the life of the first appointee. It strikes me that this testimonial will be more valuable if we make it special; and it is also in accordance with the precedent, for when General Washington died this office died with him. If we make this a permanent office, it will not be a special testimonial, and we shall lessen the honor we intend to confer. I hope that amendment will not prevail, but that the third section will be retained in the bill as it originally stood.

The SPEAKER. The third section of the bill has been already stricken out.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I should not attempt to trouble the House with a moment's remarks were it not for the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

The great struggle through which we have passed for the preservation of the nation's life has developed great virtues and merit in the American character; and among those virtues and that merit nothing stands out, in my estimation, more conspicuous than the merit of the common soldiers who have fought, under competent generals, the great battles that have secured our liberties. Sir, I should feel myself incompetent for a seat in this House if it were possible for me for a single moment to ignore the merit of those soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, there never was such an army before upon the face of the earth. The sun never shone upon such an army. I pray God that the necessity for its repetition may never occur in the world. It was an outpouring of the loyal people of the country; the giving up of sons, of fathers, of husbands, with all the comforts and endearments of pleasant and happy homes, all surrendered at the shrine of our country's honor and glory and existence. I subscribe, therefore, to all that has been said upon this subject so eloquently and so well by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKEE;] and I strike hands with him here to-day, and with other gentlemen upon this floor who think as he does, in a solemn, irreversible compact to render to these gallant men, who have come forward voluntarily to save the nation, every benefit, every reward, every compensation, which it is in our power to give them.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not go on to speak of the great characteristics of the American Army. It is neither necessary nor fit. I know there is not a man here, nor within the extended borders of this Government, who does not respond to this sentiment, and is not willing at all times and on all occasions to acknowledge it.

But, sir, this is not the only development that this war has made. It has brought out the genius and ability of men in America for the highest command in the field, and for the most skillful operations in military service. And, sir, in these developments no single man stands higher, shines brighter, or is more distinctly before the world than General Grant.

Let the minds of members here to-day recur to the year 1864. Let them remember how then the fate of this nation quivered, as it were, in uncertainty and in doubt. Let them remember how this man of iron will, of modest deportment, and of lion heart, took these gallant soldiers, the volunteers of a free people, and marched through the Wilderness with them against the most compact and powerful army that the confederacy had. See him leading those brave men through the continuous battles of the Wilderness to Richmond, before it and round it, until, as he himself said, the shell of the rebellion was crushed and its hollowness exposed to the world. And then behold this man, when Richmond had surrendered, modestly refusing to go into the city with display, to be there first to take possession of the citadel that had so long resisted our conquest. Behold him, sir, allowing others to march in in triumph, because he saw that there was more work to be done, and that work he was determined to pursue to its final accomplishment.

Leaving, then, the empty show and the place of honor, you see him giving up to subalterns the taking possession of the city of Richmond, while he goes on steadfastly in pursuit of his high purpose of making his work successful, and compelling the leader of the armies of the rebellion to lay down his sword before him. That is one of the instances that evince the characteristics of the man, and that raised him so high in the world's estimation.

And now what do we offer him by this bill? We offer him, what I will not allude to, but what we have heard so well described, and what has been so happily depicted by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING;] we offer him a small boon. Is it in imitation of aristocratic or monarchical Governments that it is proposed to do this? No; it is in imitation of the great Ruler of all who bestows blessings and rewards upon the just and righteous, and punishments upon the others. I am not here to-day to imitate what other nations have done for their high chieftains and great military men. But I desire to show my gratitude, with the gratitude of this nation, in behalf of a great and a good man. Let us do it in imitation of divine authority, and not in imitation of man. Because other nations who have preceded us may have acted in the right way, that affords no reason for refusing to pursue a just path.

One word more. I hope this House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] There is another man—and I will say, Mr. Speaker, other men—in the recent military history of this country who deserve to be remembered. Though I concede to General Grant an elevation in great deeds and in great achievements higher than any other man in this war, God so ordered, and he but fulfilled his mission. But there are other names connected with the history of America which, if they are not written so high upon the scroll of fame as that of General Grant, will be found but a little way below, and one of those names, I am proud to say, belongs to the State of Ohio.

Need I speak of the man who went to Atlanta through a field of fire and amid the hail of lead and iron, and who from Atlanta went to the sea, and—? But I need say no more. His name belongs to Ohio and belongs to the nation, and I trust and believe that while the name of Grant lives the name of Sherman will not be forgotten. And when the place now held by General Grant shall be vacated by his promotion I want the hearts of the American people to be permitted to speak out what they now feel; and that the name of Sherman shall take the place now occupied by that of Grant.

Mr. DEMING. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WHALEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DEMING. It is now late and I cannot yield.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. STEVENS.

The amendment was again read, as follows: Provided, That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of lieutenant general, by promotion or otherwise, the vacancy shall not be filled until after the death or resignation of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott; and thereafter there shall be but one lieutenant general.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 78, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, DeGrees, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClure, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Paine, Perham, Plants, Scofield, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Van Aernam, Warner, Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Bingham, Blow, Boyer, Buckland, Chandler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Eckley, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Thomas, Trimble, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Woodbridge—55.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LE BLOND. Trusting that the vote on the passage of the bill will be unanimous, or nearly so, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 11, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, DeGrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Coffroth, Denison, Farnsworth, Harris, Higby, Loan, McKee, Mercer, Morrill, and Stephen F. Wilson—11.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Benjamin, Bergen, Blaine, Bundy, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dumont, Eggleston, Garfield, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Marvin, McClure, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Moulton, Newell, Nicholson, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Ritter, Shanklin, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, and Woodbridge—56.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll, Mr. ANCONA stated that he had paired with Mr. BLAINE.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. DEMING moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING TO-MORROW.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the session of to-morrow be devoted exclusively to debate, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

MONTANA.

Mr. SMITH. I move that leave be granted to the Delegate from Montana [Mr. McLAIN] to have printed as part of the debates some remarks in regard to the interests of his Territory.

The motion was agreed to.

[His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relative to the national currency; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MARY C. REEVES.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Mary C. Reeves, administratrix of Albert Reeves, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion for printing extra copies of the internal revenue bill with the amendments agreed upon by the Committee of Ways and Means, have instructed me to state that they have examined the amendments so far as they have been determined upon by the Committee of Ways and Means, and have consulted with the chairman of that committee; and the conclusion which they have reached is, that as the amendments thus far agreed on are not material in their character, it is not advisable to order any extra copies at present. The committee, however, will be very glad to order the printing of extra copies, if there should be made hereafter any amendments of such a character as to justify the expenditure.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Colonel R. E. Bryant;

An act (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke;

An act (No. 473) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

An act (S. No. 149) for the relief of Daniel Winslow;

An act (S. No. 176) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States;

An act (S. No. 225) for the relief of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company;

An act (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington; and

An act (S. No. 278) for the relief of Captain John H. Crowell, quartermaster of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House to joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division.

MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the construction of a ship-channel across the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONFISCATION, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the 5th of March last requesting the names of persons worth more than $20,000 to whom special pardons have been issued and a statement of the amount of property which has been seized as belonging to enemies of the Government or as abandoned property returned to those who claimed to be the original owners, transmitting reports from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Attorney General, together with a copy of the amnesty proclamation of the 29th of May, 1865, and copies of the warrants issued in cases in which special pardons are granted, and the second, third, and fourth conditions of the warrant prescribing the terms, so far as property is concerned, upon which all such pardons are granted and accepted; which were ordered to be printed, and laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS moved that twenty thousand extra copies be printed.

The motion, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution from the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the standing Committees of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire and report what further provisions, if any, should be made for the accommodation of the State Department.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Maine, the resolution was concurred in.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON ROAD IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. BURLEIGH by unanimous consent submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas an act of Congress was passed March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska;" and whereas by said act the sum of $20,000 was appropriated for the construction of a wagon road from a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sioux river, via Yancton, Dakota Territory, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Chyenne river, thence up said river to its main fork, thence up the north fork to a point of intersection with the road from Niobrara; and whereas the work on said wagon road is reported to have been commenced and far advanced in 1865, by the orders from the Secretary of the Interior, during the prosecution of which work treaties are claimed to have been made with the Indian tribes occupying the country through which said road is located, by which the right of way was secured to the United States; and whereas the Secretary of the Interior is represented to have ordered a suspension of work upon said Cheyenne road, and required the superintendent having charge of the construction of the same to turn over all the stock, implements, and money appropriated and purchased for the said road to the superintendent of the Niobrara road, whereby the opening and construction of the Cheyenne road are prevented, to the great injury of the Territory of Dakota: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform this House whether the work on the said road has been arrested or interrupted by his orders, and if so, for what reason the same has been done; whether any of the moneys appropriated thereto have been diverted to the uses of the Niobrara or any other road mentioned in said act, with the authority, if any in that case, for said diversion.

LOST DISCHARGES OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas in view of the vast number of military discharges now in the hands of soldiers of the United States liable to be, as many already have been, lost beyond replacement, thereby subjecting the losers to great expense and inconvenience in verifying rights to which they are entitled: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and are hereby, instructed to consider the justice and propriety of providing by law for such county or other local registration of soldiers' discharges as shall provide against losses of originals, and which shall be sufficient evidence in all cases to entitle the parties in interest to all the benefits thereof, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

VENTILATION OF THE HALLS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to this House the report made to him by Thomas U. Walter, late architect of the Capitol extension, on the warming and ventilation of the two Houses of Congress, with the reports of Professor Joseph Henry and Dr. Charles M. Wetherill accompanying the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of R. W. Tirrell, and 500 others, citizens of Manchester, Iowa, for a law to regulate inter-State insurances.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Hill Gamble, and 34 others, of East Saginaw, Michigan, asking for the equalization of bounties.

By Mr. ECKLEY: The petition of E. M. Jenkins, and 110 others, wool-growers of Hammondsville, Jefferson county, Ohio, for an additional duty on foreign wool.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 5, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the order of the House no business is in order to-day except debate on the President's message, upon which the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUNDY,] is entitled to the floor.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 338, to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company, of Washington, was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered on the Journal.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) to extend the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BUNDY. It was my intention to address the House to-day extemporaneously, but I am entirely too unwell to proceed. I therefore ask to be allowed to print some remarks, in which I will embody the substance of what I would have said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted.

[His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of May, 1865, the Union Army numbered one million five hundred and sixteen men. After a struggle, unprecedented in ancient or in modern history, the purpose for which that vast power had been called forth was accomplished. Four years of civil war between people of the same race, of the highest type of modern civilization, and of equal intelligence, courage, and determination, had been waged upon a theater of continental proportions, had employed in its prosecution the most finished and destructive enginery, had in its terrific battles and daily skirmishes cost this generation over half a million lives, and had entailed upon the nation a debt of three thousand and upon the insurgent section a loss of seven thousand million dollars. But remarkable as was this contest in all the elements of material grandeur, it was still more memorable for the importance of the issue involved, and the extraordinary precision with which it was defined. Slavery, struggling for perpetuity, expansion, and power, struck at the existence of the Government, which, in the growth and progress of ideas necessarily came to stand in its path, arrest its advance, and menace its security. Slavery was the cause, and the only cause, of the rebellion. The idea of secession would never have been practically adopted, certainly never enforced by arms, but in defense of that institution. Hence the war policy of the Government necessarily became anti-slavery. Hence, in the fullness of time, came the proclamation of emancipation, the organization and arming of liberated slaves, the immediate and uncompensated abolition of slavery within her limits by the State of Maryland—an offering voluntarily made by that loyal State, as her contribution to the common cause in furtherance of the general policy settled upon as the only one to suppress the rebellion—and following that, the passage by Congress by a two thirds majority of the proposition to be submitted to the several States to abolish slavery throughout the country forever by constitutional amendment.

The policy thus adopted and persevered in by the Government ultimately forced a similar policy of emancipation and enlistment of slaves upon the consideration of the rebel authorities. The instant the confederate government found itself reduced to that dilemma the scales fell from all eyes. No sooner was it discovered that the thinned ranks of the rebel army, exhausted by four bloody years of incessant combat, and required to face the fresh columns that poured down with endless tramp from the North, could only be recruited from among those very slaves, to rivet whose fetters that army was in fact fighting, than the whole fabric tumbled into ruin. To arm the slaves was of course to free them, and to free the slaves to fight the battles of slavery was simply a reductio ad absurdum and a ghastly farce.

In the providence of God, it seems necessary that this most cruel of wars should have been fought to the bitter end upon the "line" which has been indicated: first, to secure from the South the complete, irrevocable, and final surrender of slavery; second, to remove all occasion for hindering the immediate pacification of the country by a desultory guerrilla warfare, so much feared and predicted; and third, to obviate all danger, and thus to extinguish in every candid mind all reasonable fear of a possible future rebellion in the interest of the defeated insurgents.

This generation cannot fully appreciate, but history will recognize the great fact of the abolition of the institution of human slavery. It is too sudden, too violent, and too vast to be fully comprehended to-day. Not the least among the many great evils of this system was the specific influence it produced over the moral sense, dwarfing and contracting the consciences of men to its narrow standard, just as darkness contracts the physical eye. Bursting suddenly and with great noise and fury into the bright air of freedom, what wonder that we should still see with dazzled and bewildered vision, that we should grope and clutch vaguely at the objects around us, that we should be tormented with panic fears and haunted with hideous dreams of the dark prison-house. It is, therefore, by no means strange to me, but quite natural, that many well-meaning but purblind patriots should still afflict themselves and society with their panic dread of rebellion; should predict the revival or even affirm the actual present existence of slavery; should start at every sound, and stampede at every shadow; should see walking by moonlight the ghost of slavery, and behind every bush a "red-handed rebel;" should rend the air with clamors for protection against this imaginary monster, and make both day and night hideous with their jargon of guarantees, conditions, and constitutional amendments. Nor is it at all surprising that these same purblind patriots, in their blundering frenzy, should strike by mistake their best friends, should attack the Secretary of State, should denounce and threaten the President, and involve in the same censure the sacred memory of his lamented predecessor.

Sir, who is Secretary Seward, that he should be hawked at and torn, not now by the knife of the traitor assassin striking slavery's last blow at its greatest human antagonist, but this time by the loud and blatant champions of loyalty? I remember him well, with his "higher law" and his "irrepressible conflict," the scarred and reënlisted veteran in this great war of liberty; and I recollect him as he stood in the Senate many years ago, when men who now revile him as recreant and denounce him as a rebel sympathizer, then scoffed at him as an abolition fanatic, as he stood at the head of a corporal's guard gallantly attacking slavery in its stronghold. Sir, it may be said of him that while Phillips and Garrison and the other humbugs of both sexes were fighting valiantly in the rear, William H. Seward was at the front, leading not the advanced guard, but the skirmish line of freedom right up to the breastworks. With Henry Ward Beecher, he has devoted all the best years of his life to the destruction of human slavery. He struck at it whenever it lifted one of its hydra heads; he has put the searing iron, hissing hot, to the last of them; he felt anxiously and skillfully for the last pulsation of the dying monster's heart; he has pronounced it dead, and he who feared it not when living and terrible is not scared at its carrion. He belongs to a more vigorous and a more practical school of statesmen. He takes this view of the case, and all sensible men of firm nerves, clear eye-sight, and good digestion, agree with him, or soon will. The South was formerly possessed of the devil, in the scripture sense, and dwelt among the tombs. While this unclean spirit was present, there was much foaming and gnashing. It was finally exorcised, and as it came rending its way from out its tormented and bleeding victim, it howled out its name, not as legion, but slavery. It became incarnate in the person of Booth, and astonished and appalled mankind by the supreme horror and last convulsion of demoniac madness, before it died the death of a dog.

Now, there are those who would scourge and manacle and cuff and curse the rescued, regenerated, and emancipated South, even before her wounds are stanchd from this frightful, this worse than Cesarean operation. Beecher and Seward are of a different school of philanthropists. They see the one but lately possessed of the unclean spirit and gnashing among the tombs, now sitting, clothed, and in his right mind. They do not look for uniform amiability, nor do they require the patient immediately, and while smarting with pain, to express profound satisfaction and intense delight with the process, nor unfeigned personal love and gratitude toward those who performed it. On the contrary, it is fair to presume that those men of honor would abandon the unhappy victim to the tormentors should it exhibit so craven a spirit and so contemptible a hypocrisy. Nor is it deemed indispensably necessary that men, otherwise loyal, should profess now to hold the doctrines which they have endeavored to maintain by the sword as false and heretical ab initio. For forty years and more they have been educated to believe the false and dangerous heresy which bore them the bitter fruits they reaped from the attempt at rebellion. It would be unreasonable to require, as it would be impossible to expect, that these people should all of a sudden sincerely and honestly believe that the principle for which they contended was false, because those who professed it have been routed upon the field. What we require and have a right to require of them is that they abandon that doctrine as a principle of action for the future. We have lost too many of our people in this war, we have shed too much blood and lost too much property and spent too much money to be altogether indifferent about the legitimate fruits of our dearly bought victory. We fought for Union, for the integrity, the immortality of our Government, and by the help of God we have conquered. We owe it to ourselves and to posterity to assure the one and the other against danger in the future. We therefore demand a searching, adequate, and irreversible guarantee of future practical loyalty. That demand is the sum and substance of the Administration policy, which it has lately become the fashion to scoff at.

Here is the "policy" in the exact language of President Johnson. I quote from his annual message to Congress, of the 4th December, 1865, a state paper that for clearness, terseness, cogency, and elegance has never been surpassed, and that for broad and catholic statesmanship and heroic intrepidity has taken the world by surprise:

"It is not too much to ask, in the name of the whole people, that on the one side the plan of restoration shall proceed in conformity with a willingness to cast the disorders of the past into oblivion; and that on the other the evidence of sincerity in the future maintenance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which provides for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of our country."

"The adoption of the amendment reunites us beyond all power of disruption. It heals the wound that is still imperfectly closed; it removes slavery, the element which has so long perplexed and divided the country; it makes of us once more a united people, renewed and strengthened, bound more than ever to mutual affection and support."

And again:

"As no State can throw a defense over the crime of treason, the power of pardon is exclusively vested in the executive government of the United States. In exercising that power I have taken every precaution to connect it with the clearest recognition of the binding force of the laws of the United States, and an unqualified acknowledgment of the great social change of condition in regard to slavery which has grown out of the war."

The same plan of restoration was embodied by President Lincoln in his famous proclamation of July 18, 1864:

To whom it may concern:

Any proposition which embraces the restoration of peace, the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery, and which will be received and considered by the executive government of the United States, and will be met by liberal terms on other substantial and collateral points.

To secure the definite, unequivocal, and irrevocable surrender of slavery, the one only cause of rebellion, the one solitary root of disloyalty, to secure it by the voluntary surrender of the insurgents themselves, and to secure it by their legislative ratification of the constitutional amendment, acting upon it as States; as States of and in the Union under the Constitution; not only so, but as States of the Union above the Constitution by actually exercising the supreme State prerogative of amendment, by, in fact, sharing the State omnipotence of organic creation; this, then, was the aim and end of the Administration policy, this was the practical restoration of the Union.

Contrasts are sometimes more useful for purposes of illustration than analogies. The stars are not visible until the blackness of night devours the light of day. With this view let us hear the bold and outspoken leader of the House, speaking, as he frankly admits, upon his own responsibility; but speaking, as he claims, with equal candor, "so as to secure perpetual ascendancy to the party of the Union," or, as he otherwise phrases it, to "continue the Republican ascendancy."

"Two things are of vital importance"—

I am quoting the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]—

"so to establish a principle that none of the rebel States shall be counted in any of the amendments of the Constitution until they are duly admitted into the family of States by the law-making power of their conqueror. For more than six months the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery has been ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States that acted on its passage by Congress, and which had Legislatures, or which were States capable of acting, or required to act, on the question."

"I take no account of the aggregation of white-washed rebels who without any legal authority have assembled in the capitals of the late rebel States and simulated legislative bodies."

The reference is to the Legislatures elected in the several States by virtue originally of proclamations emanating from provisional governors appointed by the President; all the electors and members being required to take the prescribed amnesty oath of allegiance to the Government, and acquiescence in martial emancipation.

To proceed:

"Nor do I regard with any respect the cunning hypocrisy with which they deluded the Secretary of State by frequent telegraphic announcements that 'South Carolina had adopted the amendment; Alabama has adopted the amendment, being the twenty-seventh State,' &c. This was intended to delude the people, and accustom Congress to hear repeated the names of these extinct States as if they were alive, when, in truth, they have now no more existence than the revolted cities of Latium, two thirds of whose people were colonized and their property confiscated and their right of citizenship withdrawn by conquering and avenging Rome."

Here we have outlined with the freedom and boldness of a master hand the framework of a plan which was at a very early day of the session (December 18) proposed for the consideration and adoption of Congress. This plan had for its basis the theory of "defunct," "dead," or "extinct States," or if that were adjudged impossible or absurd, then they were to be called "States out of the Union and now conquered Territories." In either case, that is, whether on the one hand they are "not out of the Union but only dead carcasses lying within the Union," or whether on the other hand "they are and for four years have been out of the Union for all legal purposes"—in either of these hypotheses the logical sequence resulted that "being now conquered they are subject to the absolute disposal of Congress."

This programme then goes on to dispose of them as subjugated foreign provinces, to manacle their outlawed people, and hold them indefinitely as the mere slaves of Congress; to force them "to mingle with those to whom Congress shall extend the right of suffrage," and in that condition, excluded from representation, though subject to taxation, governed and disciplined by imported agents and commissioners, dragooned, court-martialed, and plundered, they are to be kept "for some years" "to eat the fruit of foul rebellion." Should this training fail to develop a spirit of earnest and sincere loyalty; should the advantages of this school, in which with exquisite and inimitable humor it is declared that they are to learn the principles of freedom, "practice justice to all men," and "accustom themselves to make and to obey equal laws" appear to have been thrown away upon ingrates unable to appreciate and unwilling to profit by them, does the programme on that account fail? Not at all. It has but just begun to succeed. The remedy for obstinate disloyalty is at hand. Permanent, incurable disaffection may read its fate very plainly in that of "the revolted cities of Latium, two thirds of whose people were colonized and their property confiscated and their right of citizenship withdrawn by conquering and avenging Rome."

As a speculation upon disloyalty, this policy could not possibly be improved. If general confiscation of property, under pretext, is what is wanted, no surer road to it can be found. It is a process which, if put in operation upon a community whose loyalty was immaculate, would speedily convert it into a community of rebels. Why, sir, I believe that the spirited people of my own native State of Vermont, teased by so tormenting a tyranny, would indignantly revolt and turn upon their oppressors at every hazard and against all odds. If they did not, they would not prove their legitimate descent from those gallant men of 1781, upon whom Ethan Allen relied in his demand on behalf of the self-constituted State of Vermont for her immediate admission into the Union and representation in the Continental Congress.

"He declared to that body that no person could dispute his attachment to and sufferings in the cause of his country; but he did not hesitate to assert that Vermont had an indubitable right to agree on terms of cessation of hostilities with Great Britain, provided the United States persist in rejecting her application for a union with the States. Vermont, of all people, would be the most miserable were she obliged to defend the independence of the United States, and they at the same time at full liberty to overthrow and ruin the independence of Vermont. I am persuaded, when Congress consider the circumstances of this State, they will not be more surprised that I have transmitted these letters [letters from British emissaries containing treasonable overtures] than that I have kept them in custody; for I am as resolutely determined to defend the independence of Vermont as Congress are that of the United States, and rather than submit will retire with the hardy Green mountain boys into the desolate caverns of the mountains and wage war with human nature at large."—Hoskins's History of Vermont, page 102.

Such was the resolute and defiant attitude maintained by the infant State of Vermont, demanding of Congress admission into the Union as a right, although her independence had never been recognized nor her sovereignty established; and even her boundaries were disputed and her territory claimed by the neighboring States. And yet the memory of the bold Ethan Allen is to-day as much revered for that spirited and emphatic declaration to Congress as for his famous reply to the British commander of Ticonderoga, asking by what authority he demanded its surrender: "I demand it in the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!"

The congressional treatment of the eleven States lately in insurrection, according to the plan of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is so well adapted to provoke continued hostility to the Government and goad a maddened population into imbecile and desperate resistance that the extreme resort of confiscation which would then be justified has already been anticipated by an elaborate calculation. Four thousand million dollars are to be raised by sale of lands and such other property as can be found.

Four billions of money, mark you, to be raised out of a country blasted by a devastating war, out of a people stripped and picked by rebel sequestration, their whole slave property and their entire circulating medium annihilated; a people at this moment, many of them, begging their victuals and clothes of the North!

This programme of dissolution and reconstruction is of course incomplete without a series of amendments to the Constitution, all of which are to be consummated "before the defunct States are admitted to be capable of State action."

"They ought never to be recognized as capable of acting in the Union or of being counted as valid States until the Constitution shall have been so amended as to make it what its framers intended, and so as to secure perpetual ascendancy to the party of the Union," &c.

The first of these amendments is to change the basis of representation from Federal numbers to actual voters. The others are to allow Congress to lay a duty on exports, to make all laws uniform, to prohibit the assumption of the rebel debt, and lastly, to extend the right of suffrage to the emancipated blacks, although upon this point there seems to be some doubt as to whether the result may not be reached by direct congressional action. In either case, whether by constitutional amendment or by legislation, universal negro suffrage must be enforced as well "to continue the Republican ascendency" as because "without the right of suffrage in the late slave States the slaves had far better been left in bondage."

As an earnest of the enforcement of this policy, and as a pledge of the principle on which this Congress would legislate for Territories over which it claimed jurisdiction, the action of this House, at a very early period of the session, may be cited.

A bill passed the House in January establishing universal negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. This was done by a valid exercise of power, Congress having by the Constitution exclusive legislation over this District in all cases. It was done, however, in direct violation of the wishes of the people of the District, and against the almost unanimous protest of the legal and qualified voters. It was not called for by the public sentiment of the country. Since the breaking out of the rebellion, New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Connecticut had been asked to enfranchise the few colored men within their limits. They all refused. In the State of New York it assumed the form of a proposition to permit negro suffrage without a property qualification. In 1860 such a proposition had been defeated by—yeas 197,503, nays 337,984. In 1864, after the presumed advance of public sentiment upon this question, a like proposition was defeated by—yeas 85,406, nays 224,336. In August, 1862, a vote was had in the State of Illinois on several propositions relating to negroes and mulattoes, with this result:

For excluding them from the State.....	171,893
Against.....	71,306
	<hr/> 100,587
Against granting them suffrage or the right to hold office.....	211,920
For.....	35,049
	<hr/> 176,271
For the enactment of laws to prohibit them from going to or voting in the State.....	198,938
	<hr/> 154,524

As late as the autumn of 1865 the people of Connecticut refused by over six thousand majority to enfranchise the handful of colored men residing among them. An effort was made in the Thirty-Eighth Congress to incorporate the feature of negro suffrage in the bill to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana. It failed; and among those who voted persistently against negro suffrage in this new Territory, where there were perhaps no negroes at all, are the names of the entire Maryland delegation, consisting at that time (1864) of Messrs. Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Harris, Thomas, and Webster.

After so many and such decided manifestations of public opinion, showing unmistakably that the people of this country are inflexibly opposed to a general and promiscuous intermingling with negroes at the polls and in public office, it was scarcely to be expected that the repudiated doctrine should be forced upon the protesting population of this District. Whatever reasons may be urged in support of universal suffrage in general, they all fail in the case of a municipal corporation. There are no people or interests within the limits of the District of Columbia of any importance that are not included within the corporate franchises of the cities of Washington and Georgetown. There is no voting done in the District except for the municipal officers of the two corporations.

It was therefore unfortunate that the political experiment of universal negro suffrage should first be applied to a city corporation, in which the horde of voters thus manufactured were, with scarcely an exception, without a particle of interest in the body whose franchises they were made to share, and whose funds they were assigned to control. Up to this time the rash feat of legislation remains a failure under the silent veto of the Senate and the dead weight of public opinion. It is significant, however, of the fate in store for eleven States, under the false doctrine that by attempted secession they have consummated the dissolution of the Union, and by the failure of their insurrection, the surrender of their insurgent armies, and full and complete submission to the authority of the Government and obedience to its laws, have done no more nor less than lapse into the condition of conquered territories, subject to the absolute disposal of Congress.

I do not propose to review in detail the arguments or to discuss the authorities by which this doctrine has been maintained. I have been surprised, upon a question of such moment, at a crisis in our country's history of such transcendent gravity, to encounter a line of reasoning so utterly fallacious. The pivot of the whole argument is the concession of beligerent rights. Humanity required an observance of those restraints and courtesies which are due to an enemy by the law of nations. Cartels for the exchange of prisoners, and flags of truce to bury the dead, are therefore pointed to as the evidences of a state of war between independent foreign nations. That is what this argument amounts to, and nothing more. I was still more astonished to find the narrow technical doctrine of estoppel drawn from its proper sphere in the county court to reinforce this feeble logic. South Carolina must be held to be out of the Union because her convention and Legislature roundly affirmed that she was in so many words. Notwithstanding the Government took issue with South Carolina upon that identical proposition, denying that she was out of the Union in law, and in fact making good that denial by waver of battle, still South Carolina, under this doctrine of estoppel, must be held to have succeeded from the very fact of failure, and the Government to have failed from the very fact of success.

Sir, we have had a war for union, not for disunion. We have fought, not to consummate secession, but to prevent it. We were called forth, and we went forth, to put down treason, to enforce the laws, to crush out rebellion, to maintain the Government, and to save the Union. With our martyred leader we first tried to save the Union with slavery and we failed. We then tried to save it without slavery and we succeeded. We did not fight to secure the ascendency of a party, or to keep any man or set of men in office, but we fought for our country, for its Constitution, and its flag.

It was on this principle that the great contest began, and it was on this principle, held steadily in view by every department of the Government that it was prosecuted to a successful issue. These principles were clearly set forth by President Lincoln in his various proclamations and messages, letters and speeches. In his first inaugural, March 4, 1861, he laid down the correct doctrine, from which, to the day of his death, he never departed:

"It follows that no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances. I consider, therefore, that in view of the Constitution and laws, the Union is unbroken, and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States."

The executive department, speaking through the Secretary of State, explicitly declared that—

"The Congress of the United States furnishes a constitutional forum for debate between the alienated parties. Senators and Representatives from the loyal portion of the people are thus already fully empowered to confer; and seats also are vacant and inviting Senators and Representatives from the discontented party who may be constitutionally sent there from the States involved in the insurrection."

To the same principle Congress also is committed by its acts and resolutions. The act of August, 1861, laying a direct tax of $20,000,000 upon the United States, apportions that sum among the several States, including all the States then in rebellion by name. Thus Virginia is recognized as still a State within the Union: "To the State of Virginia, $937,530,667." And so with North Carolina, South Carolina, and all the eleven. Each is taxed by name, and each is named as a State, as in the case of the loyal States.

The act of Congress of March 4, 1862, under which the present House of Representatives was chosen, recognizes the right of these States to representation, in terms.

Thus we have the great fact that these States were living States, States of this Union, States subject to taxation and entitled to representation, conclusively settled by Congress itself, and settled at the very time when the people of those States were actually in flagrant insurrection. If doubt should still exist as to the true intent and meaning of these acts let Congress be its own interpreter. The record here is familiar but cannot be too often repeated. It is one of the great landmarks in this controversy and should always be kept in sight. In July, 1861, a resolution was adopted by such large majorities in both Houses of Congress as amounted virtually to unanimity, declaring:

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

The principle thus emphatically pronounced by Congress and the Executive was the common sentiment and universal understanding of the whole country throughout the entire period of the rebellion. It was affirmed by State Legislatures; it was announced in party platforms; it was enforced everywhere by loyal speakers and the loyal press. It was significantly recognized by the Union national convention which admitted the delegations from Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana, upon an equal footing with the other States, following in this respect the example of Congress, and presented the name of Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, to the suffrages of the American people as the Union candidate for Vice President of the United States. It was triumphantly sustained at the ballot-box by the nation at large. And it is the same Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, who is to-day laboring to apply that same principle, in perfect harmony and consistency with his own record and with the known wishes of the lamented Lincoln, surrounded and supported by a Cabinet of Lincoln's selection.

The evidence of the recognition of these States as States in the Union, by force of the combined authority of both Congress and the Executive, culminates in their ratification of the great constitutional amendment as declared by the official certificate of the Secretary of State. That certificate was officially published on the 18th of December, 1865, in pursuance of an act of Congress, (April 20, 1813), providing that when the State Department shall have been officially notified that any proposed amendment to the Constitution had been adopted according to the provisions of that instrument—

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, forthwith, to cause the said amendment to be published" * * * * "specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid."

After reciting the amendment, the certificate of the Secretary of State proceeds as follows:

"And whereas it appears from official documents on file in this Department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed as aforesaid, has been ratified by the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Rhode Island, Michigan, Maryland, New York, West Virginia, Maine, Kansas, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Missouri, Nevada, Indiana, Louisiana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Vermont, Tennessee, Arkansas, Connecticut, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina, and Georgia, in all twenty-seven States; and whereas the whole number of States in the United States is thirty-six; and whereas the before specially named States whose Legislatures have ratified the said proposed amendment constitute three fourths of the whole number of States in the United States:

"Now, therefore, be it known that I, William H.

Seward, Secretary of State, by virtue and in pursuance of the second section of the act of Congress approved the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," do hereby certify that the amendment aforesaid has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States."

Thus, by the joint authority of both Congress and the Executive, eight States that are claimed to be out of the Union, or dead States within the Union, from their participation in a rebellion for slavery, are finally and conclusively recognized as constitutional States of the Union for the highest of all purposes. It is a fortunate and auspicious circumstance that the highest proof that could be offered of their legal and constitutional status is connected with the strongest guarantee that could be given of their repentance for the past and their loyalty in the future.

I use the word "repentance" designedly. True repentance consists not in loud-mouthed professions. It consists in "bringing forth fruits meet for repentance." How much the South was chastened, humbled, and punished by the stern hand of war, he only can estimate who remembers the strange, infatuated fondness with which her people clung to their peculiar institution, and who appreciates the vast amount of wealth represented by it. It must not be forgotten by those whose clamors for the punishment of traitors grow incessantly louder as the danger from treason grows less, that in addition to the loss of the flower of the southern manhood in battle; in addition to the utter annihilation of the entire circulating medium in the pockets of these people and of the invested wealth in their safes; in addition to the wide-spread devastation and ruin of a desolating war, the crowning punishment of confiscation has already been their portion. Emancipation was punishment to every man who owned a slave. I have always believed that treason was a crime. Myself, I shrank from it as from pollution, until the time came to close with it in a death-grapple. For the leaders of rebellion, those who fired the southern heart and precipitated revolution, I have no sympathy, even now, in their disgrace. I have believed that treason ought to be punished, and I believe that it has been punished. If there be those who still thirst for vengeance, there may be exceptions, but I believe that they belong principally to that class of patriots who, in the words of General Sherman, "shun the fight and the march, and are loudest, bravest, and fiercest when danger is past."

In the view which I have taken of the great constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, it appears in a fourfold aspect:

1. As a surrender of the cause of the war.
2. As a pledge of sincerity in accepting the result of the war.
3. As a guarantee of future loyalty.
4. As a punishment for treason, by confiscation.

Is anything else wanted to pacify the country, restore the Union, close up our ranks, and march with solid, unbroken front against imperialism in America and despotism throughout the world? Is anything else to be done before confidence can be restored at home, trade revived, finances strengthened, currency settled, and resources developed?

The freedmen must be cared for and protected in their rights. I admit the necessity. It is already provided for. Under the second section of the amendment Congress has all necessary power over the subject. With the learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM;] I had constitutional scruples about the civil rights bill which I could not overcome even for the pleasure of reversing a veto. But that bill is now a law; it will probably be several years before it is judicially negated; in the mean time the freedmen under its operation are secure, and the public sentiment around them will gradually make all special legislation unnecessary.

Is anything else demanded? "Traitors must be kept from ruling the country they strove to ruin." "Loyal men must govern a preserved republic." That is my belief. That exigency also has been foreseen and provided for. You have a test oath searching and stringent enough to satisfy the most exacting. Under it no traitor can enter Congress or hold a Federal office. I ask you now to administer that oath to Maynard and Stokes and Cooper, and to other brave and loyal Representatives from Tennessee. I ask for the immediate and unconditional admission of the Tennessee delegation on the floor of this House upon an equal footing with those of us who come from other loyal States. It is too late to argue the claims of that State. The whole country knows them by heart. During a great portion of the war Tennessee was actually represented in Congress; in this House by Maynard, in the Senate by Andrew Johnson, the seraph Abdiel of the great rebellion:

"Faithful found
Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal."

All the evidence taken by the joint committee on reconstruction concurs in the propriety of the prompt admission of her representatives to prevent the warm and glowing loyalty of her people from being chilled, as the loyalty of any people would be, by a persistent and contemptuous ostracism.

General Fisk, the commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for Tennessee and Kentucky, headquarters at Nashville, Tennessee, testifies as follows:

"Tennessee abolished slavery by her own action; she elected a Governor by the people; she repudiated the rebel debt; she ratified the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and did all that without executive indication or inauguration. Tennessee furnished thousands for the defense of the Union. All this is to her advantage, and were I a member of the Senate or House of Representatives of Congress I would vote most cheerfully to admit the delegation from Tennessee, believing that in so doing I would be taking a step that would increase the loyal sentiment of the State, and which would promote the tranquility and prosperity of the State."

The testimony of General George H. Thomas is equally emphatic upon this point; and, in fact, there is but one opinion among all acquainted with the actual condition of the people of that State. Why not, then, admit the Tennessee delegation? Is anything else demanded?

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the joint committee of fifteen, composed as it is of gentlemen of character, experience, and ability, would have given us, as the result of their protracted labors, some proposition on which all loyal men might unite. I did hope in the beginning that within a week after their organization, at least when Congress reassembled in January, they would report in favor of the immediate admission of the representatives of Tennessee. I believe that a majority of the House were prepared to admit those Representatives on any day when the question could be fairly got before them. Their admission has been delayed, and now, under the operation of the reconstruction programme recently reported from that committee, it appears that the State of Tennessee is to be indefinitely excluded from the Union. I say indefinitely, because her admission is made to depend upon the ratification by three fourths of the States of a series of constitutional amendments, which three fourths of all the States will never ratify. It is not enough that Tennessee herself ratifies the amendment. That does not entitle her, by this scheme, to the recognition of Congress. If the real intention had been to encourage southern loyalty by discriminating in its favor, the plan would have recognized States as they successively wheeled into line upon the platform.

Not only are these States to be excluded until every one of these amendments shall have become part of the Constitution, but each is required, by the third section of the amendment, to disfranchise nearly the whole of its voting population. Disfranchisement is a war measure, and in time of rebellion is almost as necessary a means of defense as an army. It is altogether unsuited to a condition of peace, and, in fact, there can be no real peace in any community where such a proscriptive policy is long persisted in. It is unfortunately true that in most of these States the mass of the population "adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort." Whether "voluntarily" or not would be, in the majority of cases, a nice question of casuistry. After the triumphant suppression of a revolt it is not wise or statesmanlike to go back for a minute inquisition into past offenses and canvass calmly and leisurely the by-gone effervescences of fierce excitement. "Let the dead past bury its dead." There are doubtless at the South inveterate, malignant, bitter, revengeful rebels. There are men there who, if tried for treason, lawfully convicted, and sentenced to be hung, could not succeed in getting even my signature to an application for executive clemency. Such men are a curse to any country. Such men brought on the rebellion, and such men are to-day doing the South more harm by their loud-mouthed ranting and offensive demonstrations than all the radicals in the country. I believe such cases to be more numerous in Maryland and the other border States than in the confederacy itself. I believe such cases to be less numerous in the late rebel army than in the great army of "sympathizers," marching like Noah's animals into the ark, male and female. On that side, as on ours, there is a class whom General Sherman's description was made to fit, "A class who shun the march and the fight, and are loudest, bravest, and fiercest when danger is past." Such men, though few in number and contemptible in power, attract attention from the noise they make. One grasshopper makes more noise in a field than a herd of cattle. As a question of propriety, I should like to see such men suppressed; by disfranchisement if that would get rid of them.

But, unfortunately, no practicable test can be found to discriminate such men from others whom it is not politic nor right to proscribe. I refer to men "who did go into rebellion, but who, having taken the amnesty oath, mean in good faith to keep it." Such men are loyal men, and loyal men ought to participate in the government of the country. Sir, I know men who have done, and are now doing, yeoman service in the Union cause who could not literally swear that they had never "voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort." Are such men to be now kicked out into the limbo of traitors? God forbid! Let us rather take them by the hand and encourage them to persevere. Likely as not, they will one day get far beyond us in the progress of loyalty, and turn back to reproach us for our want of zeal! No, sir, you will have to abandon this sweeping indiscriminate proscription of a whole population, that is, if you are in earnest when you say "it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union be restored to full participation in all political rights." If you are not in earnest, but only want an issue to disturb the minds of the people of the North by telling them from the stump frightful stories about the people of the South to prevent their participation in the next presidential election, and thus "to secure the Republican ascendancy;" why then keep it in, and let an intelligent people decide the issue.

The first section of the proposed amendment is as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

By the fifth section—

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

And by the bill accompanying the proposed amendment, entitled "A bill to provide for the restoration of the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights," it is required, as a condition precedent to the admission into Congress of the Senators and Representatives from such State, that it shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity with the amendments.

By "citizens of the United States" are meant persons of color, they being declared such by act of Congress. The "privileges or immunities" of citizens are such as Congress may by law ascertain and define. I presume it will not be denied that under this amendment, if adopted, it would be for Congress to define and determine by law in what the "privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States consist, in like manner as Congress has already, under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery and conferring the power to enforce its abolition by appropriate legislation, determined that the emancipated blacks are "citizens of the United States," and defined in what their civil rights as such citizens consist.

An act of Congress to define the privileges and immunities of citizens could and doubtless would be made to include the privileges of voting, serving upon juries, and of holding office. Those privileges must, then, be incorporated into the constitution and laws of each of the States excluded before they have complied with the terms prescribed. Civil rights are limited to suing and testifying in courts, and being amenable to the same punishments as other citizens. "Privileges and immunities" are a much broader and more comprehensive term, and may, by definition, include suffrage, jury duty, and eligibility to office.

It might, indeed, be argued that even in the absence of a declaratory law, these franchises are necessarily conferred upon all "citizens of the United States" by the simple terms of the amendment itself. With such a law, negro suffrage and eligibility is at once enforced over the whole country; in the excluded States by virtue of the provision requiring them to modify their constitution and laws as a condition precedent to representation; in the loyal States by virtue of the provision giving Congress power to enforce the provisions referred to by appropriate legislation.

It is no recommendation to me that this covert introduction of negro suffrage is so artfully framed as almost to escape observation and avoid odium. I would much rather vote for a direct, honest, manly proposition that all men could understand at once, than for an equivocal process accomplishing the same result by machinery. If it is wise, statesmanlike, patriotic, or proper to take from the States the qualifications of voters, and to enforce at this time over the length and breadth of the land universal negro suffrage and eligibility, then, sir, let us make the issue visible and face it like men.

The second and fourth sections relate to the basis of representation and the repudiation of the rebel debt and of claims for emancipated slaves.

That relating to the basis of representation is founded upon a correct principle, and if submitted in connection with a proposition looking to the immediate and unconditional admission of the representation of Tennessee and Arkansas would probably remove all difficulty. No special objection would be made to the fourth section, although I regard it as wholly unnecessary. The idea that under any combination of parties in the future this Congress would ever entertain a proposition to pay the rebel debt or compensate the owners of emancipated slaves is too trifling to govern the action of statesmen. As for the individual States, they have all, or nearly all, incorporated such a provision in their constitutions, and if they had not they are not able by any process to escape the payment of their proportion of the national debt. The collection laws of the Government operate directly upon individuals and upon property in all the States. It will be as much as the people of those States can do for many years to pay their share of the Federal taxes, and the danger of their assuming the debt of the exploded confederacy or the payment of claims for emancipated slaves is, in my judgment, wholly imaginary.

A few words with respect to the present condition and future prospects of the southern States generally, and I have done.

As to the disposition of the people of these States, there are two lights to guide us to a judgment. One is by way of inference or logical deduction from the necessities of their situation; the other is positive testimony. After all is said about rebels that can be said, they are but human beings governed by like motives and actuated by self-interest with other mortals. Obviously this interest prompts them to renew and strengthen their allegiance to the Government. The surrender of slavery has left them without a motive for rebellion. Loyalty, which means habitual obedience to law, is man's normal condition in society. These people must necessarily settle into that condition, if not prevented by maladministration. Their strongest desire now is naturally to be completely restored to the full enjoyment of their political privileges as members of the Union. This desire has increased with the difficulties thrown in their way. I was not of those who wished to see the Representatives elected from these States resuming their seats in this Hall on the first day of the session as though nothing had happened. I was perfectly willing to have them subjected to an ordeal of reasonable delay, one result of which would be to increase their appreciation of the privilege they sought. It is their interest now to overthrow the dogma of secession, since a legitimate application of it results in fixing their status as aliens and subjugated. The only interest they ever had in upholding it was as a means of protecting, in the last resort, their peculiar institution. They will gradually, but surely, become fixed in sound principles of constitutional construction, from the very necessities of the situation.

It seemed at one time absurd to suppose that the present generation could ever form a sincere attachment to the Federal Government or any department of it. And yet the forgiving disposition manifested by our lamented President Lincoln caused the death of him whom they had loathed to be sincerely mourned as a calamity to the South. The unexpected clemency exhibited by President Johnson, compelled by the exigencies of his great office and the moderate counsels of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, to leave harsh and vindictive utterances, hot from the boiling caldron of civil war, unrealized in time of peace, soon won for the executive department of the Government the confidence and even affection of the majority of the southern masses. Their interest in the legislative branch of the Government will return at once with their admission to a participation in it.

After a careful and anxious survey of the situation, made under an awful sense of responsibility to my country and to history, with no personal predilection or private interest that I am aware of to warp my judgment toward the conclusion it has reached, but with prejudices and interests all bearing in an opposite direction, I am constrained to believe that all further guarantees, by way of constitutional amendment or otherwise, as conditions precedent to a cautious and discriminating admission of loyal Representatives from States and districts whose inhabitants have been in insurrection, but who now present themselves in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, are unnecessary, impolitic, unstatesmanlike, and prejudicial to the peace and welfare of the country. The guarantees we have, and which I deem sufficient, are:

1. The constitutional amendment abolishing slavery and conferring upon Congress ample power to enforce it; and

2. A loyal army of one million fighting men, just as determined to stamp out treason should it dare to show itself in the future, as they have proved themselves able to deal with it in the past.

The direct testimony as to the actual condition of the southern people is of course conflicting. I have, however, seen nothing which has materially shaken my confidence in the evidence of Lieutenant General Grant. His opportunities for observation have been ample, his judgment is not biased by partisanship, his sound common sense, his knowledge of human nature, his keen penetration and almost intuitive discernment of character are the most solid pillars upon which his great reputation rests.

His testimony is substantially corroborated by that of Major General Sheridan, furnished at a later period. General Grant testifies as follows:

"I am satisfied that the mass of thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. The questions which have heretofore divided the sentiment of the people of the two sections—slavery and State rights, or the right of a State to secede from the Union—they regard as having been settled forever by the highest tribunal—arms—that man can resort to. I was pleased to learn from the leading men whom I met that they not only accepted the decision arrived at as final, but, now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and time has been given for reflection, that this decision has been a fortunate one for the whole country, they receiving like benefits from it with those who opposed them in the field and in council.

"Four years of war, during which law was executed only at the point of the bayonet throughout the States in rebellion, have left the people possibly in a condition not to yield that ready obedience to civil authority the American people have generally been in the habit of yielding. This would render the presence of small garrisons throughout these States necessary until such time as labor returns to its proper channel, and civil authority is fully established. I did not meet any one, either those holding places under the Government or citizens of the southern States, who think it practicable to withdraw the military from the South at present. The white and the black mutually require the protection of the General Government.

"There is such universal acquiescence in the authority of the General Government throughout the portions of the country visited by me that the mere presence of a military force, without regard to numbers, is sufficient to maintain order. The good of the country and economy require that the force kept in the interior, where there are many freedmen, (elsewhere in the southern States than at forts upon the sea-coast no force is necessary,) should all be white troops. The reasons for this are obvious without mentioning many of them. The presence of black troops, lately slaves, demoralizes labor, both by their advice and by furnishing in their camps a resort for the freedmen for long distances around. White troops generally excite no opposition, and therefore a small number of them can maintain order in a given district. Colored troops must be kept in bodies sufficient to defend themselves. It is not the thinking men who would use violence toward any class of troops sent among them by the General Government, but the ignorant in some places might; and the late slave seems to be imbued with the idea that the property of his late master should, by right, belong to him, or at least should have no protection from the colored soldier. There is danger of collisions being brought on by such causes.

"My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government, not humiliating to them as citizens, and if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith. It is to be regretted that there cannot be a greater commingling at this time between the citizens of the two sections, and particularly with those intrusted with the law-making power."

Mr. Speaker, it is not well that the people should be deceived in this matter, nor can they be. The question is simply one of union or disunion. Let the issue be frankly made and squarely met. Let the great contest be made under no doubtful colors, with trumpets sounding no uncertain sound, and may God defend the right!

For myself, I wish no new war-cry. I want to see no new motto emblazoned upon the victorious flag of my country. I will recognize none that has not been with it under fire. "Liberty and Union!" words embroidered there by the eloquence of Webster, are still proudly borne upon its folds. Let them remain there, with all the added significance that the great war for liberty and Union has imparted; with universal liberty achieved for all the inhabitants of the land, and Union, unconditional Union, the determined aim of all who rally around it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I had fondly hoped, Mr. Speaker, when Lee surrendered to General Grant, and Johnston surrendered to General Sherman, the last armies of the rebellion, that we had heard the last of southern chivalry, and that we also had heard the last and seen the last of northern sycophancy and northern flunkynism. I had fondly hoped that there had been evinced enough of heroism and patriotism in the northern people in meeting and overpowering the rebel armies in that one grand, continuous "onward march" for four years in maintenance of the integrity of the Republic to have inspired those men who in former years had been the subservient tools of the southern aristocracy with something like an appreciation of true manhood, so that they would, either for shame, or by virtue of the heroic example that had been set them by the true men of the North, have been willing to have remained in silence, and let the work of reconstruction be performed by those who had saved the country by arms, or at least not have shocked the country again by that flunkynism, that subserviency, that sycophancy, that has ever disgraced that class of the northern people in their pliant yielding to every demand of the South. I had hoped that those examples of heroism would have had at least a silencing effect upon them, and that they would not have thrust themselves forward as the willing tools of their former masters.

But, sir, in this I have been mistaken; my fond hopes have not been consummated. I have been mortified beyond expression to find in the North that same set of men now advocating with the same reckless energy, and the same lack of honor and of principle, anything and everything which the reconstructed rebels tell them to advocate. They are as ready and willing to-day to subserve the purposes of the whipped yet arrogant rebels as they ever were. They are as ready to join hands to-day with them as they did in the passage of the odious compromise measures of 1850, just as they would have joined hands with them during the rebellion if they could have reached over the line of loyal bayonets between; just as they did join principles with them in their Chicago convention and platform in 1864 for the sake of restoration to political power, or even for the moiety of power that might be granted them by the generosity of the South; but what can you now expect of the men who in time of war sympathized with the enemies of the country? The old battles for liberty and justice on the one side and for slavery and tyranny on the other are upon us again, and we must fight them out. The clash of arms it is true has ceased, the physical battle has ended between the North and South, but the old battle of ideas is upon us still. The honest-hearted, patriotic, high-minded, honorable men in the North who are contending for principle have the same opposition, the same obstacles, to meet and overcome that they had before the rebellion. We have advanced, it is true, but there is great work yet before us. The rebels were not made rebels in a day, and they cannot be made patriots in a day. They were the legitimate offspring of slavery after an incubation of at least half a century, and now some are so crazy as to suppose that they can be turned into patriots in an hour. In my opinion, they must be born again. The only difference is this: during the war the rebel had a musket, now he has none. The difference is in the musket, not in the rebel.

Mr. Speaker, if the northern people had been united upon the great principles upon which this war was prosecuted, and in the prosecution of the war at any time during the rebellion, it would have insured the complete and immediate overthrow of the rebel power and the establishment of peace upon the broad principles of eternal justice. We lacked that unanimity, and hence the terribly protracted struggle, involving the sacrifice of half a million noble men and millions of treasure. It required all the energy of the honest-hearted and patriotic people to maintain the arm of the Government against the rebellion, aided and encouraged as it was by the copperhead party; and now that the war has ceased it requires all the same energy, all the same patriotism, all the same devotion to principles, to maintain the legislative power of the country against the power that has been defeated on the field of battle but which is now attempting to usurp the Government, and in this wicked attempt they are aided, I regret to say, by the Executive of this nation; in fact, he is their leader; without him they would be powerless for evil. We have not only the defeated rebels to fight in this contest, together with their natural allies the copperheads in the North, those who sympathized with them and would have fraternized with them, but for the line of loyal army that interposed between them and their rebel friends, but we have in addition the executive power and patronage of this Government.

But, sir, we are not dismayed nor disheartened. We have been used to temporary defeats, to severer trials than this. We have gone through a storm of war and blood without intimidation, and, sir, as God loves liberty and justice, as the American heart throbs in response to the sentiment of universal liberty, just so sure this same power that was unconquerable in war will be successful in peace, and we shall triumph at last over southern aristocracy and chivalry, over northern sycophancy and flunkynism, and the President also. They will all have to succumb to the heroic and invincible power of northern patriotism, fighting as we are the battles of universal liberty and universal justice.

No, the northern patriots are not disheartened. They have given freely of their blood and treasure; they are now submitting to taxation by reason of the burdens that have been imposed by the war without a murmur; they have submitted to it all without complaint, and with an endurance and a confiding trust that have no parallel in history, and they are ready to endure and suffer whatever may be necessary for the glory and unity of the Republic. They will not suffer the fruits of their great victory, won at such enormous sacrifices, to be bartered away. They will reap the fruits of their victory; they will reestablish the Republic on the principles of justice, and they will never permit any rebel State to be represented in the Congress of the United States until it shall establish a government that is republican in form, and recognizes the rights of mankind, irrespective of color, within its local jurisdiction.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there has been a false issue presented to the people. The President of the United States has done what he could to present an issue to the people that is calculated to mislead and deceive them. He has disguised his real purpose. He talks plausibly (so do all imposters) about "harmonious relations," "taxation without representation," occasionally mentions "soldiers and sailors," and now and then even ventures to use the word "patriotism." But what is all this for? Look at his acts, and then say to me, if you can, that the dearest object of his heart is not to secure representation from the rebel States, so that he may receive their support as a candidate for election to the Presidency in 1868, and receive their vote in the Electoral College. Under a pretense of restoring the Union he is playing a game for the "succession," otherwise he would demand guarantees from the South that the commonest prudence would declare necessary before they are clothed with full political power.

The President and his friends continually persist in declaring to the people that the issue now is, whether or not a State can secede; whether or not the States of the South have been out of the Union or have continued in it; that the question now is, in what way we shall "restore" those States to the Union, or, in the language of the President, "restore them to harmonious relations with the Government;" for the President denies that they have ever been out of the Union, and his present friends sustain his side of the issue.

Now, so far as the practical question for our action is concerned, so far as the interests of this Republic are concerned, so far as the interests of liberty and of justice and of universal right are concerned, it is an immaterial issue whether they are in or out of the Union. So far as the legislation of Congress is concerned, so far as the future status of the States that have been in rebellion is concerned, it matters not whether they have been out of the Union or not, or whether they are in the Union or not. We have heard too much already about States in and out of the Union, and not enough about the rebels in those States.

The question is not, whether those States shall have representation in Congress, but whether the rebels in those States shall be so represented, and allowed to vote here with reference to a restoration of those States to the "harmonious relations" we have heard so much about. It is a matter of supreme indifference to me and to the loyal masses of this country whether those States, technically speaking, are in or out of the Union. But it is a question of vital importance to the country whether those unrepentant rebels shall be represented in Congress, and by their power here defeat the objects of the loyal majority in Congress, defeat the restoration of the Union upon a loyal and humane basis. This is the real issue.

And so far as my voice can go I will use it for the purpose of unmasking the deception that the President of the United States would impose upon the people of this country. To what does it amount to whether I insist that the States are out of the Union, if I allow them to be represented here? Or what does it amount to if I concede that they have never been out of the Union, if I consent to their being represented here? Nothing in the world. They will admit that they are out of the Union, if you will admit them to representation in Congress; and they will not even thank you for insisting that they are in the Union unless you also admit them to representation in Congress; the power to vote loyalty down is what they want. The question is, whether the rebels (who would control absolutely the power and future destiny of those States if they are admitted into the Halls of Congress) are in a fit condition to be allowed representation here. You know, Mr. Speaker, and I know, that when a State, no matter how long it has been in rebellion or what the effect of that rebellion may have been upon that State or its people, is once admitted to representation in Congress it is placed on an equal footing with the other States of this Union, and has the same rights in Congress and out of it that any loyal State has. If you let the President carry out his programme of restoration, then farewell to your intervention by Congress; farewell to the restraining power of the Freedmen's Bureau; farewell to your constitutional amendments and your "civil rights;" farewell to any and all legislation here which interposes in behalf of the true Union men of the southern States.

When you admit these rebel States to representation here they care not whether you consider them as being in the Union or out of the Union so long as you give them a voice here again. And when you give them their votes here you give them a power which, when united with their northern sympathizers in Congress, will overwhelm the Union party and Union measures and reform (I should say deform) this Union in accordance with their own ideas. Are you, the million of brave and patriotic soldiers who survived the shock of war; are you, the patriotic men who defended and sustained our Army against the assaults of the "fire-in-the-rear" party, ready for this kind of restoration? The sacred blood of our martyred heroes cries to Heaven against it.

I take the ground, admitting, for the sake of argument, most distinctly, that no matter if a State cannot get out and never was out of the Union, yet by the rebellion of its people against this Government, by waging open war upon its lawful authority, every citizen within such State would become thereby an alien enemy to the United States, and liable to be treated by this Government in all respects as one who never was a citizen of this Government, a foreigner domiciled within its territory, to say nothing of the right of the Government to hang them as rebels and enemies. If that position is correct, then it follows that if within any certain State all its inhabitants become alien enemies the Congress of the United States is alone vested with power to establish a government for them, to make laws for them, to control them so long as they shall remain alien enemies or simply aliens. I lay this down as an axiom in our Government: that when a person is an alien enemy, either by being the subject of a foreign jurisdiction or by virtue of his own treason, he remains an alien enemy to this Government until Congress relieves him from that disability. The President's position is, that a citizen of the United States may be a rebel belligerent firing at the life of the nation to-day, and a lawful citizen to-morrow, and entitled of right to representation in Congress!

An alien enemy, being such by virtue of his rebellion and treason, forfeits all the rights that he ever enjoyed under the Constitution and as a citizen of the United States. He forfeits the right to vote; he forfeits the right to be represented in Congress; he forfeits the right to hold office; he forfeits every right except such as he may exercise under the law of nations; and the fact that he may have been born in this country only adds a deeper blackness to his crime; he is entitled to only the same protection, and that, in fact, only by the courtesy of the Government, that would be accorded to a subject of Great Britain, or any other foreign Power, if he were simply domiciled within the jurisdiction of the United States. Let us not forget that these rebels were the most favored of our citizens. Their every interest had been generously protected and fostered by the Government always; and now, after they have sent to untimely graves half a million of the nation's bravest sons; after they have deluged the land with blood and covered it with a shroud of woe, in the names of Fort Pillow, Libby prison, and Andersonville, they demand representation in Congress, and Andrew Johnson and William H. Seward say they ought to have it.

Mr. Speaker, am I right when I declare that the people of these rebellious States are alien enemies to this Government? If I am, when and by what means did they become alien enemies? Was it by act of the Government of the United States? No, sir. Was it by their own act of war? It was. If, then, they were ever alien enemies to this Government, when did they cease to be such; or are they not alien enemies to-day? They are alien enemies this day, unless by act of Congress they have been recognized as being otherwise. The President cannot change an alien into a citizen. The Constitution has vested no power of naturalization upon the President. Congress alone is vested with that power. A foreign-born subject is required to reside in this country for five years before he can become a citizen, unless he has served in the Army; then why should these native-born rebels receive so much more consideration than a foreigner residing peaceably among us with the intention of becoming a citizen?

Sir, let me lay down in connection with this subject this proposition of law: that in order to be an alien to the United States Government it is not necessary that a man should be foreign-born. He may be an alien although not foreign-born. And I hold, sir, that the people of the southern States did, by treason and rebellion, become alien enemies to this Government. By their warfare against the Government they became its enemies; and by the laws of war they became alien enemies and liable to be treated as such. Let me read, upon this point, from Lawrence's Wheaton on International Law, page 899:

"In the United States it is incorrect to suppose that alien as opposed to citizen means foreign as respects country. Indians are the subjects of the United States, and therefore are not in mere right of home birth citizens of the United States; but they may be made citizens by some competent act of the General Government, by treaty or otherwise."

Now, sir, with reference to these rebels who inaugurated a rebellion, who formed a de facto government, recognized by the civilized Powers of the world as entitled to belligerent rights; which was recognized by our own Government as entitled to belligerent rights; they became enemies, and alien enemies, although not foreign-born. And, sir, I hold, in accordance with the law which I have read, that the character of alien continues until relieved by competent authority of the General Government.

I read now from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, as recorded in 2 Black's Reports, page 666, to show that the inhabitants of the southern States did, by virtue of their rebellion and treason against the United States, become alien enemies, and that is an independent fact, without reference to the status of the rebel States in their relation to the Union:

"A war may exist where one of the belligerents claims sovereign rights as against the other.

"Insurrection against a Government may or may not culminate in an organized rebellion, but a civil war always begins by insurrection against the lawful authority of the Government. A civil war is never solemnly declared; it becomes such by its accidents—the number, power, and organization of the persons who carry it on. When the party in rebellion occupy and hold in hostile manner a certain portion of territory; have declared their independence; have cast off their allegiance; have organized armies; have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents, and the contest a war. They claim to be in arms to establish their liberty and independence, in order to become a sovereign State, while the sovereign party treats them as insurgents and rebels who owe allegiance, and who should be punished with death for their treason.

"The laws of war, as established among nations, have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war. Hence the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other belligerent rights. They exchange prisoners, and adopt the other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars.

"A civil war," says Vattel, "breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Having no common superior to judge between them, they stand in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms."

"This being the case, it is very evident that the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity, moderation, and honor, ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war. Should the sovereign conceive he has a right to hang up his prisoners as rebels, the opposite party will make reprisals, &c.; the war will become cruel, horrible, and every day more destructive to the nation."

The Supreme Court say:

"As a civil war is never publicly proclaimed ex nomine, against insurgents, its actual existence is a fact in our domestic history, which the court is bound to notice and to know."

"The true test of its existence, as found in the writings of the sages of the common law, may be thus summarily stated: 'When the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the courts of justice cannot be kept open, civil war exists and hostilities may be prosecuted on the same footing as if those opposing the Government were foreign enemies invading the land.'"

"The law of nations is also called the law of nature; it is founded on the common consent as well as the common sense of the world. It contains no such anomalous doctrine as that which this court are now for the first time desired to pronounce, to wit, that insurgents who have risen in rebellion against their sovereign, expelled her courts, established a revolutionary government, organized armies, and commenced hostilities are not ENEMIES because they are traitors; and a war levied upon the Government by traitors in order to dismember and destroy it is not a war because it is 'an insurrection.'"

In this opinion the court declare that these rebels, these traitors, these insurgents, who have been prosecuting this war against the Government, are ENEMIES, to be treated in the light of public enemies, or alien enemies, entitled to the same rights as though it were a foreign war originally, and no more. And now I ask, when the character of an alien once attaches to the rebellious party, when does that character cease? Does it cease simply because they acknowledge their defeat on the battle-field?

Not at all. The character of any criminal does not change when, being detected and overtaken, he acknowledges the crime and proffers to make restitution; he is a criminal still. The rebels were only defeated in carrying out their traitorous designs because they were met and overpowered by the heroism of the northern people. Let us illustrate this a little further. We will presume that the people of Mississippi in 1860 were peaceful citizens; in 1861 they were rebels; in 1862, 1863, and 1864 they were belligerents; in 1865 they were subjugated; in 1866 the Government arrests the leaders for treason. But, say the rebels, you cannot try us for treason; although at first we were rebels, we afterward established the "confederacy," and you recognized us as a de facto government, as alien enemies, as belligerents; you waived the right to try us for treason in thus recognizing us. Well, we reply, if that is so, we will dismiss the charge of treason, and treat you as conquered public enemies, as aliens. No, no; that will not do; we will not submit to that; we claim, that notwithstanding you had the lawful right to fight and subdue us, that as soon as you wrested our arms from us we were at once transformed into citizens of the United States Government we sought to destroy, and are now entitled to representation in Congress and all other rights we ever enjoyed under the Constitution. We deny your conclusions, and we propose to contest the point with you before the people.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion we would have but little trouble in settling these difficulties, or finding a solution of the problems which now weigh so heavily upon the country, had the President of the United States but conscientiously and honestly discharged his duty. Had he had more judgment and less ambition, more patriotism and less egotism, had he desired to subserve the interests of his country rather than his own, we would have had an easy deliverance from our troubles. When the surrender of the rebel armies was made, Andrew Johnson was President of the United States. He had exercised the authority but a few days. He had no experience in the administration of the Government, but he had ambition. He had a desire to make himself conspicuous before the country and before the world, and consequently, blinded by his ambition and crazed by his egotism, he refused to do what the simplest-minded man knew he ought to have done under such circumstances. You all remember the condition of the country at that time. He ought to have called the Congress together at once in special session, called together the representatives of the party who, confiding in his honor and his patriotism, based upon what he had publicly said on all occasions from the very inauguration of the rebellion, elected him Vice President.

Had he thus called the representatives of the people together to counsel and advise with, it would have been an easy matter for Congress at that time to have shaped the legislation of the country to a solution of these difficulties, and adjusted a basis of reconstruction satisfactory alike to the loyal people of the North and the subjugated people of the South. The latter were willing at the time of the surrender to accept almost any conditions which would have spared their forfeited lives and their forfeited property. They were thoroughly whipped; they were subjugated, and they were ready to acknowledge it. From the published speeches the President had made previous to their subjugation, and immediately after, they never dreamed of finding any clemency in his heart. They simply expected the rights and privileges belonging to a vanquished foe. They never dreamed of being regarded as citizens of the United States, entitled to the right of representation in Congress, and the right to "restore" the country they had moved heaven and earth to destroy.

No, sir, they never dreamed of it. The leaders expected to be hung, if they put any reliance upon the oft-repeated utterance of Mr. Johnson, that they should be hung, for he had declared time and again that he would hang them; that he would make treason odious; that it was the greatest crime known to the calendar of crimes; that traitors should be punished. This he had declared, and they knew it. With an army to back him, and loyal people to sustain him in carrying out these declarations, they never dreamed of finding clemency and encouragement and protection, as the sequel has shown they have found, at his hands! Not only protection, sir, but promotion! and he has given them to understand that they have a constitutional right to deliberate in the councils of the Government they attempted to disrupt and overwhelm; that they have a constitutional right to make laws which are to determine the future status of the States and the people of those States who have been engaged in this formidable rebellion against the Government. Under the President's programme they are becoming much emboldened of late. Many of the southern papers insist upon it that all acts of the present Congress are illegal and void, for the reason that the eleven southern States are denied representation in Congress. They even go so far as to advise the President to call the southern representatives to Washington, and have them go in a body and claim their seats; and in case opposition is offered to this proposed outrage, they tell the President to apply the bayonet and clear the House of the radicals! This is easily enough said, but it will never be done. The New York News, referring to this subject of representation in a late number, said:

"The radicals oppose their admission. They bar the doors. They stand armed with stolen and unlawful weapons to dispute the passage of duly elected members of Congress to their rightful seats in the national Legislature. Then why does not the Chief Magistrate of the Republic interpose his authority to prevent this outrage against the representatives of the States and of the people? He has the power to do so. He is Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, and has at his disposal an armed and disciplined force amply sufficient to preserve the peace at the seat of Government, and to enforce obedience to the laws beneath the roof of the Capitol of the Republic. Let a day be fixed for the representatives of the southern States and people to take their seats in Congress. The seats are there ready to receive the rightful claimants. Let them enter, take possession of their own and fulfill their official functions. Should violence be offered them by any man, or number of men, under any pretense whatsoever, let the President send a detachment of Federal troops to preserve order in the Capitol."

"If radical conspirators attempt to support their usurpation by force, the consequences be upon their heads. It is time that the Republic should have a complete and constitutional Legislature. We have been ruled too long by faction. We have been too long subject to the caprices of fanatics. The country must be permitted to resume its normal condition, and if revolutionists stand in the way, the executive arm is strong enough to sweep them from the path of restoration."

The Richmond Whig gives the following advice to Mr. Johnson:

"Call together a Congress composed of members from all the States of the Union, as well those of the South as those of the North, and that if the radical members should refuse to attend, that he shall recognize the northern conservative members and the southern members as the lawful Congress to sit in the Capitol and legislate for the country. The Whig does not see how this programme could be accomplished peacefully and supposes that the radical sectional Congress, as it terms it, would continue its sessions, appeal to the people, and proceed to muster an army if the United States Army should not side with it. In that case the Whig believes that the President would be prepared to meet force with force."

The Enquirer of the same date, discoursing on the same subject, says:

"It is evident, indeed, that a violent collision between Congress and the President is inevitable, and is imminent, if the true spirit and intent of the Constitution shall remain true, and its forms abused for the usurpation of power. In this issue the President has thus far been altogether in the right, and has evinced all the moderation. Congress has been wholly in the wrong, and has displayed a corresponding violence. That the public peace is yet unbroken is due to the President. It depends upon Congress whether it can be permanently maintained, for we take it for granted that the President will not yield himself an unresisting victim to revolutionary violence, whatever garb it may wear, or allow the Constitution, to defend which the sword has been given him, to be overturned or destroyed. A congressional coup d'état can be met by a presidential coup d'état, and in the collision the hardest must fend off as to what should be the President's pillow."

The Charleston South Carolinian says:

"There are obvious steps to the more firm establishment of this Government in the call of a congress composed of the members of the southern States and such members of the present Congress as are ready to sustain his policy. In such a congress there would be large a Senate and nearly as large a House, while with such a body to sustain him he can even more justly represent the Government, and throw the radicals, who shall accept the issue, into the defensive attitude of an adversary faction."

Is this "bringing forth fruits meet for repentance," that the President used to talk about? How do you like this picture of "reconstructed" rebels?

Ah! sir, this failure on the part of the President to call Congress together was a great misfortune to this country; the greatest which ever befell it, perhaps, with the exception of one. It was a greater misfortune when Booth, the assassin, sent his bullet, with unerring certainty, through the brain of that purest and best man, who, by his patriotism and by his virtue, ennobled and elevated that country for which he died. That was one of the great calamities which befell the country. Ah! how little did we then know how much we lost. The next, as it has turned out, was that Andrew Johnson was Vice President! Had Andrew Johnson been an honest man, and had he been with us, from principle, in this contest, it would, sir, have softened the rigor of that first calamity to the American people.

But Andrew Johnson was never with the Republican party on principle; never, sir. In the first place he was for maintaining this Union, as can be proved by his last speech in the United States Senate, with slavery; for he deemed slavery secure only in the Union. In that speech he distinctly avowed that he was going "to fight for slavery in the Union;" he was satisfied that in the Union was the only safety for slavery, and that outside of it was certain ruin. He emphatically declared that "the institution would be perpetual if southern men stood together in the Union."

Andrew Johnson is essentially a southern man. Born, reared, and educated in the South, he has the prejudices of the southern people; he has their animosities, their hatreds, and their superstitions. He, however, was never recognized by the leaders of the South, who inaugurated the rebellion, as one of their peers, so he sacrificed nothing of a social character when he refused to go with them. He had never been with them as one of the spokes in their political wheel. Andrew Johnson to-day is filled with the poison of the malaria of slavery which he inhaled in his infancy, and during the ripening years of his life, and this I say in extenuation of his present position. He talked loudly, eloquently, and well with reference to the odiousness of the rebellion and the blackness of the crime of treason while it was his interest to do so. While he could remain in the United States Senate, or so soon as he resigned that position receive the appointment of military governor of Tennessee, and go there and maintain authority and power, and receive the emoluments of office, he could talk as loudly in favor of the maintenance of the Union, and for the suppression of the rebellion, and that traitors ought to be punished, and all that, as any man. I do not know but he has excelled almost any other in his denunciations of treason, and in his assertion that it must be punished, &c., and that the people must be taught that treason is the crime of crimes.

But, sir, so soon as Andrew Johnson finds himself clothed with executive power and with the immense patronage of his position, and so soon as he had surveyed the political field, he says to the people of the South "All my denunciations against you are nothing but gammon. I am talking that for New England. I never mean to carry out any of my threats against you. You take care to sustain my policy, and in 1868 I will be the candidate for the Presidency. I will see that none of your necks are stretched for treason; I will see that none of you suffer; I will take care of the South if you will let me humbug the northern people by these denunciations against the offense of treason. Do this and it will all come out right."

Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] delivered a speech on this floor a few days since, in which he challenged the Union party, or any of its representatives in this Congress, "to show wherein Andrew Johnson had been a traitor to the pledges and professions he had made during the rebellion." Is it to be expected that any one is to be gammoned by any such "gasconade" as this? Are we to be told, and is it to be believed, that Andrew Johnson occupies to-day the same position that he held in 1864 and has held from 1861 up to within the past few months? There is a radical difference between the Andrew Johnson of to-day and the Andrew Johnson of a year ago; there is also an antagonism between the men who elected him and the men who now support him. Is not Andrew Johnson to-day trampling upon the principles he sustained and proclaimed a year ago? I proclaim here that he is, and I will prove it by his own record. Why, sir, if the Andrew Johnson of to-day is the man we elected Vice President then we have most wonderfully transformed ourselves. Somebody has been transformed. Either the Democratic party that denounced him as a traitor and a scoundrel of the deepest dye has been transformed, or the Union party or Mr. Johnson has been "transmogrified." Somebody has changed—things are not now as they were. That party which recently denounced him now sustain him, from Vallandigham down, filling the air with huzzahs in his praise. Unless the entire Union party has been transformed in a brief period there has a change come over the spirit of the dreams of the Democratic party, and over its actions, too. Is it the Union party or the Democratic or Andrew Johnson that has changed?

Sir, the Union party has not changed, nor has the Democratic party changed. The Democratic party is the same uncompromising foe of progress, civilization, liberty, and justice that it ever was during the rebellion, and the Union party stands to-day where it has always stood, undaunted and invincible, neither intimidated by threats nor seduced by patronage, the constant and untiring friend of liberty, union, and universal justice! God bless the Union party, say I!

There is nothing in common between the Democratic and the Union party. There is an antagonism which is irreconcilable between them; an antagonism as great as that between the Union party and Andrew Johnson. That antagonism does not exist between the Democratic party and the President. Andrew Johnson is doing all he can to sustain the Democratic party. He has abandoned his old friends. He has betrayed the party that gave him a name and a position among the potentates of the earth. He has betrayed the principles that he himself advocated within the past four years. He has given the lie to the sentiments which he expressed during the war on vital and important questions!

Sir, no man can make me believe, nor the Union men of this country, that the Democratic party which opposed the war, which created the Chicago platform of 1864, declaring the experiment of restoring the Union by war a failure; the party which strove to get up "a fire in the rear" of the loyal heroes fighting to put down the rebellion; no man can make me believe that that party in sustaining the Andrew Johnson of to-day is supporting the Andrew Johnson of 1862, 1863, and 1864.

The Democratic party are not fools. They know that they are sustaining a man who coincides with them, and who is promoting their interests. They are using him to aggrandize their party, and when they have accomplished their ends they will drop him. And the time will come when he will be so low that there will none "so poor as to do him reverence," even in the Democratic party.

I assert that there never existed a man so exalted or so powerful that he could betray the party that placed him in power and survive that betrayal without dishonor and disgrace. Not an instance is known in the history of the world where a man betrayed his true friends, betrayed the party that placed him in power, who did not render himself politically infamous by that act of betrayal.

If illustrations were necessary I might cite the cases of John Tyler and James Buchanan. What did either of them make by their betrayal of those who elevated them to power? They have made a history which their children (if they are so unfortunate as to have any) will weep to read. So will Andrew Johnson, if he persists in the betrayal of those who put him into power, sink to the same level with Tyler and Buchanan; he is on the down grade now, and he will reach them if he does not soon stop.

Mr. Speaker, let us go to the record of the President of the United States and see what that proves. I have taken some little pains in the short time that I could spare from the discharge of other duties to run over his record, and ascertain what positions he assumed and what principles he enunciated during the war, for the purpose of contrasting them with those which he has been uttering during the last six months. Let the record itself show the contrast. It will appear as well defined and as apparent as the contrast between midnight and noon-day.

I quote now from Savage's Life of Johnson, on page 231, from the speech of Andrew Johnson, as a Senator from Tennessee, in the Senate of the United States, in the year 1861:

"Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the motion to clear the galleries, I was making a general allusion to treason as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and to those who were traitors and guilty of treason within the scope and meaning of the law and the Constitution. My proposition was, that if they would show me who were guilty of the offenses I have enumerated, I would show them who were the traitors. That being done, were I the President of the United States, I would do as Thomas Jefferson did in 1806 with Aaron Burr, who was charged with treason. I would have them arrested and tried for treason, and if convicted, by the eternal God they should suffer the penalty of the law at the hands of the executioner."

Now, I can point out to Andrew Johnson who the traitors are. And now let him dare to declare that by the eternal God he will have them tried, and if convicted he will hand them over to the executioner!

It will not satisfy me that Andrew Johnson is an honest man because he handed over to the executioner the poor miserable miscreant Wirz, and that poor unfortunate woman and three others who were one and all the mere tools of the intellectual instigators of the assassination. That was but little; they had no friends; they amounted to nothing. Andrew Johnson had no reference to such persons when he made this declaration in the Senate of the United States. No, sir; he made that declaration against the rebel leaders, against those in high position who were inaugurating this rebellion. And what has he done to fulfill that promise? "Were I President of the United States," says he. And now that he is President of the United States, clothed with the power that he seemed to desire at that time, what has he done toward the consummation of that promise? He has done nothing. He has not ordered the trial of any single man in the United States for treason.

On the other hand, he has pardoned or paroled every single traitor against this Government, with the exception, I believe, of two, perhaps but one. When it became necessary for General Humphreys, who had surrendered his sword not more than ten days before to General Sherman, to be pardoned, that he might enter upon the duties of Governor of Mississippi, here was Andrew Johnson ready to pardon him. He had not been from the battlefield three weeks before he was elected Governor of Mississippi by the returned rebel legions of that State; and Andrew Johnson at once sent him an executive pardon to enable him to enter upon the duties of that office. And I have been told that General Humphreys never as much as asked for it.

Instead of making treason odious, as he promised to do, he has done all that he well could to restore traitors to political power and to shield them from the legitimate results of their crimes. He has given them place; he has given them power; he has recognized them as being entitled to all the rights of loyal citizens under the Constitution, with here and there a solitary exception. And if I were a betting man, if I may be allowed to make use of such a phrase here, I would bet all that I have on this earth that he never will order the trial of Jeff. Davis; and that if he is ever tried and convicted, Andrew Johnson will pardon him. I only wish I was as certain to live a thousand years, and enjoy health and youth, as I am that Jefferson Davis never will make expiation for his bloody crimes while Andrew Johnson is the President of the United States!

Now, let us go a little further into this record, and see whether Andrew Johnson is a man who is keeping his promises or not; and whether it is true, as he would have it, that the northern men are all crazy radicals, and have themselves "gone back" on the principles they adopted during the progress of the rebellion. In this same Life of Johnson, by Savage, on page 295, Andrew Johnson is recorded as having made use of this language, in his speech at Nashville, while he was exercising the duties of military governor under commission from Abraham Lincoln:

"But in calling a convention to restore the State, who shall restore and reestablish it? Shall the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization? Shall he who brought this misery upon the State of Tennessee control its destinies?"

Just listen:

"Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If this be so, then all this precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers so freely poured out will have been wantonly spilled."

Sir, if that language was true as regarded the State of Tennessee, is it not true in reference to every other State situated as Tennessee was. Certainly, sir; if it was wrong with regard to the local legislation of the State of Tennessee that traitors should participate in the reorganization of their local government, the same objection exists with regard to their reorganizing any other State government which they have destroyed. Will not the same objection exist with regard to traitors participating in the reorganization of the General Government in assuming its rightful jurisdiction over the rebellious States and in restoring them to the Union practically? "Rebels should not be represented in the Tennessee Legislature," but "they should be represented in the Congress of the United States." I cannot harmonize these two positions of the President. They are irreconcilable.

But Andrew Johnson does not talk to-day as he did then. No, sir, he is for letting all those rebels participate in the conventions and in every step toward reconstruction; and if there is any treason in the way he has a pardon in his pocket ready to hand it to the man who may be embarrassed by any disability of that kind.

Let us continue the examination of the record:

"All the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught and all the battle-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain."

"Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished."

"Therefore I say that traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration."

Sir, if Andrew Johnson could have his way to-day, traitors would take a front seat in the work of restoration. He has turned square round. Then, when he was acting with the Union party, he proclaimed to the world "that traitors should take a back seat." Now he proclaims that traitors shall have a front seat. He would give them front seats in this Hall! He would introduce here the rebel horde from Mississippi, Alabama, and other insurrectionary States. He would have their names called on our rolls, and let them engage here in the work of legislation. That is what Andrew Johnson desires to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I had promised to yield to my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL;] but if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is not through, I prefer to yield to him till he shall conclude. He is engaged in a business which I think ought to be finished.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am much obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy. I shall try to be as brief as possible. I was not aware that I was occupying so much time.

Let me quote further:

"If there be but five thousand men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom!"

Mark the language! Then he demanded that men should be loyal to freedom. That principle, like his avowals in favor of liberty and justice, he has deserted!

"If there be but five thousand men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom, loyal to justice, these true and faithful men should control the work of reorganization and reformation absolutely."

"Loud and prolonged applause," according to this report, followed that remark. Sir, I will guaranty that not one single man who joined in that demonstration of applause, applauds Andrew Johnson to-day; not one, sir. Every man who applauded that sentiment denounces the course of Andrew Johnson to-day, denounces his apostasy from the principles expressed in that speech. The men who applaud him to-day are the men who denounced him then, and who, when he made that speech, hung their heads or looked defiant and sullen. To-day they are patting him encouragingly and energetically on the back, and telling him that he is a second Andrew Jackson; that though he claims to be a "tribune" of the people, they are using him to advance their own purposes; and he seems not to know it; and he does not want to know it; but the true men who voted for him know it; he cannot deceive them.

It is refreshing to read the expressions of Andrew Johnson a few years ago. By virtue of such declarations as those I have read, he inspired the loyal North with confidence in his patriotism, in his integrity, in his love of universal freedom and justice to such a degree that when the patriotic Union men met in convention at Baltimore in 1864 they placed the name of Andrew Johnson upon their ticket next to that of Abraham Lincoln, and we went forth and battled for him faithfully and heroically against the same party who are denouncing us to-day and supporting him with the same vigor that they denounced him in 1864. This is the picture I want Andrew Johnson to look upon. It is a picture which the real friends of humanity and justice weep over.

Andrew Johnson has declared that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen; and that is the position I have taken here to-day, that the traitor has ceased by reason of his rebellion and treason to be a citizen; and that simply because he failed to consummate that treason in the overthrow of the Government, he has not been restored to his citizenship, for no traitor can be restored to citizenship until the supreme legislative power of this Government so restores him:

"I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men."—Andrew Johnson.

Did he, Mr. Johnson? Did the traitor forfeit his right to vote while you were Governor of Tennessee under Abraham Lincoln? If he did, how has that right been restored to him? If that right was forfeited while you were Governor, why does not that forfeiture continue till this day when you are President? Let him answer that if he can. He knows the truth is that he cannot answer it except by reaffirming his old position. The right to vote was forfeited by the crime of treason, and that crime has not been expiated. There has been no forgiveness, there has been no restoration of that right of citizenship, and that forfeiture continues to-day, so that there has not been a legal vote cast by a rebel since the inauguration of the rebellion. "He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he sought to destroy our Government."

"We say to the most honest and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us and to add to the wealth of the country, 'Before you can be a citizen you must stay here for five years.' If we are so cautious about foreigners, who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor who, although born and reared among us, has raised a pariahal hand against the Government which always protected him?"

Those were burning words, and how timely they are now. If the executive power were to carry those words into execution, Andrew Johnson would stand to-day among the honored men of the world, and as one of the first champions of liberty on the earth, if not the very first.

"My judgment is that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship."

That was said by Andrew Johnson when Governor of Tennessee. What ordeal is he subjected to before he is restored to citizenship, as Mr. Johnson now understands it? I will tell you. It is the ordeal of a trip to Washington to ask Andrew Johnson to pardon him. And that is all the ordeal he has to pass through. If he cannot get money enough to make his personal appearance, an application, I suppose, through the mail—

A MEMBER. Or female. [Laughter.] Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; I have heard it said that a female was quite as effective.

Let me continue this, for it is refreshing. "A fellow," says Mr. Johnson, in referring to a rebel. Does Andrew Johnson call one of these southern people a fellow? Oh, yes; but that was in 1862 and 1863. Now it is "the honorable gentleman from Mississippi," "My friends from Virginia," "The noble chivalry of the South whom I have so long and intimately known, and can so thoroughly trust." [Laughter.] But he then said:

"A fellow who takes the oath merely to save his property, and denies the validity of the oath, is a perjured man, and not to be trusted. Before these repenting rebels can be trusted let them bring forth the fruits of repentance."

If the loyal people ask Andrew Johnson to show the fruits he has gathered from repenting rebels, what can he show them? He can show them nothing but stacks of applications for pardons!

"He who helped to make all these widows and orphans, who draped the streets of Nashville in mourning, should suffer for his great crime. The work is in our own hands."

That is a good point well presented. Let it be echoed by the people of the North, that he who helped to make these widows and orphans and drape the land in mourning should suffer for his great crime. But how does he suffer for his great crime under Andrew Johnson? By receiving a pardon with the seal of the Executive upon it or a commission to a Federal office. That is all the suffering I have heard of as yet.

"The work is in our own hands." Ah! that was true and would be to-day if Andrew Johnson was true to the principles he advocated a few months ago. The work is in my opinion in our own hands yet, whether he is with us or against us. We shall rely upon the steady and unflinching loyalty of the people, and Andrew Johnson though President will find when he opposes the executive power against the eternal principles of right which have been sustained by all this blood and treasure that he will be as powerless as a rush; that he will be overborne by the power of the people, and will find that the people in the right are greater and more powerful than the President in the wrong. I shall trust the people. I shall appeal from Andrew Johnson to the people, and I fear not their verdict.

They will vote for Congress as it is, and Andrew Johnson as he was!

Sir, let Andrew Johnson remember that the very people who are sustaining him to-day, the very men who are calling upon the country to support the President's policy, are the same men who so vehemently denounced him and hounded him but a few months ago. They are the men who were against him and all others who were fighting for the Government during the bloody years of war. None of his old friends support him now, except it may be some parasite, some lick-spittle who wants some contemptible office within his gift. They are the only ones. Every high-minded man who was for this war and this Government, for freedom and justice, is against Andrew Johnson to-day. Yes, sir, let him remember he could not to-day in the grand State of Illinois, who sent forth two hundred and fifty thousand of her sons to fight for the maintenance of the principle and sentiments he uttered in his speech at Nashville, get those men to go for him now although they voted for him in 1864. There is but one place they would go to now on his account, and that is to his political funeral. They would gladly follow him to his political grave.

Mr. Speaker, if he were a high-minded and honest man, when he finds he cannot carry out the principles of the party which placed him in power, that he cannot maintain the policy maintained by his true friends, he should resign his office. I believe we had an example of that kind in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. Mr. Stebbins, elected by the Democratic party in New York, found, when he came here, that he could not carry out the principles of the party which had elected him, and he accordingly resigned his seat like an honest man! Andrew Johnson should follow that example, and resign, for I declare that he is not carrying out nor intending to carry out the principles of the party which elected him Vice President!

But let me proceed with his speech:

"Ah, these rebel leaders have a strong personal reason for holding out—to save their necks from the halter; and these leaders must feel the power of the Government."

They did not know that he was going to be President, or that "reason for holding out" would not have existed.

That is not all. "Treason must be made odious." Is that all? "And traitors must be punished and impoverished!" In 1862 he declared they must be punished and impoverished, and now, sir, he is restoring every acre of land they enjoyed or occupied which by the military power had been turned over to the poor freedmen, taking it from them and handing back to these rebels. That is the way in which Andrew Johnson makes treason odious. Failing to make it odious by punishing southern men, he himself has made it odious by his treachery to the party and the principles of the party which placed him in power! If he is not a traitor to the Government and Constitution of the United States he is a traitor to the party which elected him Vice President, and to the sentiments which fell from his lips in 1862, and which found a welcome response in the hearts of the loyal men of the country.

Hear him again:

"Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized, and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men. The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of rebellion is past. It is high time it was."

It was past then, and you, Andrew Johnson, should not have inaugurated a different policy. You have brought the dark days back! You have reversed the order of things. Instead of dividing up their "great plantations" and selling them to honest and industrious men, you are restoring to rebels their plantations, granting them pardons, and asking their admission into the Congress of the United States!

I now read from his speech upon the fall of Richmond:

"If we had an Andrew Jackson he would hang them as high as Haman, but as he is no more, and sleeps in his grave in his own beloved State, where traitors and treason have even insulted his tomb and the very earth that covers his remains, humble as I am, when you ask me what I would do, my reply is, I would arrest them, I would try them, I would convict them, and I would hang them."

A little further on, in the same speech, he says:

"In my opinion, evil-doers should be punished. Treason is the highest crime known in the catalogue of crimes, and for him that is guilty of it, for him that is willing to lift his impious hand against the authority of the nation, I would say, death is too easy a punishment. My notion is that treason must be made odious and traitors must be punished and impoverished; their social power must be broken, and they must be made to feel the penalty of their crimes. Hence I say the halter to intelligent, influential traitors."

Suppose, sir, he should declare such sentiments to-day, what would be the effect? The throng that now surrounds him at the White House would disappear; the smiles of northern Democrats and the caresses of southern rebels would cease at once.

But let us see what further he says:

"The American people must be taught, if they do not already feel, that treason is a crime and must be punished; that the Government will not always bear with its enemies; that it is strong, not only to protect, but to punish."

Sir, under the rule of Andrew Johnson it is neither strong to protect loyalty nor to punish treason, for he refuses both. By his vetoes of the Freedmen's Bureau bill and of the civil rights bill, he refuses that protection which he declared it was the duty of the American people to extend to the freedman and to the poor southern Unionist. And he refuses to punish traitors. He has had within his power Jefferson Davis, the head and front of the rebellion, for one year, and has not yet ordered him to trial. He refuses to punish everybody that held any leading position in connection with the rebellion. Again, Mr. Johnson says:

"When we turn to the criminal code and examine the catalogue of crimes, we there find arson laid down as a crime, with appropriate penalty; we find there theft and robbery and murder given as crimes; and there, too, we find the last and highest of crimes, treason. With other and inferior offenses our people are familiar; but in our peaceful history treason has been almost unknown. The people must understand that it is the blackest of crimes and will be surely punished. I make this allusion, not to excite the already exasperated feelings of the public, but to point out the principles of public justice which should guide our action at this particular juncture, and which accord with sound public morals. Let the engraving on every heart that treason is a crime, and that traitors shall suffer its penalty. While we are appalled, overwhelmed at the fall of one man in our midst by the hand of a traitor, shall we allow men—I care not by what weapons—to attempt the life of the state with impunity? While we strain our minds to comprehend the enormity of this assassination, shall we allow the nation to be assassinated?"

Shall we allow the nation to be assassinated? That is the question that is upon us to-day, and if Andrew Johnson persists in the course he is now following, this nation will be in danger of assassination by the same fell power that took the life of Abraham Lincoln. They may not use the same weapon, but it will be as murderous in its effects upon the life of the nation. The pretense is the restoration of the southern States and the readmission of rebels to the Congress of the United States. Carry out the policy of Andrew Johnson, and you will restore the old order of things, if the Government is not entirely destroyed; you will have the same old slave power, the enemy of liberty and justice, ruling this nation again, which ruled it for so many years.

In a conversation with Sir Frederick Bruce, the President used this language:

"The time has come when traitors must be taught that they are criminals. The country has fairly made up its mind on this point; and it can find no more earnest agent of its will than myself."

What egotism! No more earnest agent of the people's will than himself! Has he not falsified that by every act he has done for the last six months? Why, he could not make an address two years, or even one year ago, without speaking of the odiousness of treason and the certainty of its punishment. But now, though he has not ceased to make speeches, he has ceased to talk about treason being made odious and that rebels must be punished; he has ceased saying anything about these matters, but talks about their restoration to political power in this Government. That is the difference between Andrew Johnson of to-day and the Andrew Johnson of 1864.

Now, I have shown but one phase of the character and history of Andrew Johnson. Let us look for a few moments at the other phase. After he came to be the Executive of the nation, he at first almost startled the nation by his earnest denunciation of the crime of treason, and his promises in reference to the certainty of its punishment. But soon his old associates came around him. They wheedled him and flattered him and made him believe that he was a great man, and had more power than the people of the Republic who had elected him. They represented to him that all he had to do was to cut loose from the friends who had placed him in power, and accept them as his counselors, advisers, and friends, and he has done so. And now, instead of being the man entitled to the gratitude, confidence, and love of the loyal American people, he has only the support of the late rebels in arms and their sympathizers and apologists in the North.

The American people have borne a great deal; they can still bear a great deal. But it does seem to me that it is hard that we should be afflicted with the rinderpest, the trichina, the cholera, and Andrew Johnson, all in the same year. [Laughter.] Yet, with the blessing of God, I believe we shall survive all this; and that we shall exist after the Administration of Andrew Johnson shall have ended; that we shall rise superior to it by the power of the loyal people; that we shall preserve this Government notwithstanding the mad policy of the Executive and in spite of his southern friends and his northern copperhead supporters. I believe that the day will come when the American people will show to the world that under the American Constitution treason is a crime and that traitors will be punished. But Andrew Johnson will never teach the world that lesson!

Andrew Johnson is a consummate demagogue; he is one of the most unblushing demagogues that now exist in this country. And I will prove that by his own record; by the record that he has himself made. He has been making some speeches recently, and I have only to refer to them to prove the truth of the assertion I have made. He has presented himself before the American people in his speech to the soldiers and sailors, and in his speech of the 22d of February, if you can call that a speech. He tells them how much he has done, what trials he has endured, what privations he has suffered, what hardships he has undergone, and how much property he has lost in his efforts to save the Government and the country, "and now," says he, "can you doubt my loyalty and my intentions and my good will?"

Sir, Andrew Johnson has made no sacrifices worthy of any mention, and if he has, an appreciative and grateful people would remember them without his thrusting them in their faces on every occasion. What has he suffered? He has not suffered so much as the humblest private that fought in our armies during the rebellion. The humblest private that fought at Gettysburg or in the Wilderness is entitled to more credit than is Andrew Johnson for what he has done. Has Andrew Johnson ever fought the enemy in battle? No, sir. Has he ever made an effort to find the enemy on the tented field? Never. Has he ever even smelled gunpowder? Has he ever camped on the frozen ground? Has he ever stood guard in the stormy and dreary nights numbed with the frosts of winter? Has he ever suffered any of the privations common to the soldier, or endured any of the hardships of campaign life? No, never; not even an hour!

What has Andrew Johnson suffered? He suffered being United States Senator in 1861; he has suffered being military governor of Tennessee, snugly ensconced in a mansion at Nashville, with a brigadier general's straps on his shoulders, and feasted and toasted, with sentinels pacing before his door while he was securely and quietly sleeping through the watches of the night, while others braved the dangers he never met!

And will the American people allow him to impose his infamous policy of "restoration" upon them because he claims to have suffered so much? No; sir, not even if his pretended sufferings were real. Andrew Johnson has suffered nothing worthy of remark. I will allow myself to be interrupted by any gentleman who can tell me what Andrew Johnson has suffered, unless it be that he has suffered the pangs of an uneasy conscience for his perfidy to the principles of the Union party. That kind of suffering would be good for him, and I hope he may have plenty of it. There is certainly plenty of cause and I trust it may have a good effect.

Andrew Johnson, as I was remarking, is a demagogue. In 1862, when he was in Nashville, he told the colored people that he, Andrew Johnson, military governor of Tennessee, was going to be their Moses and lead them out of the bondage of Egypt into the Canaan of liberty. He made a mistake, to say nothing more. Instead of being their Moses he has been their Pharaoh. And if I am not greatly mistaken this modern Pharaoh and his present admirers will be swallowed up and overwhelmed in the sea of popular indignation which is rising in the loyal States. Why, sir, Andrew Johnson had at one time words of cheer to the freedmen, to the negroes, who had suffered more than he ever did for the preservation of this country. Sir, of the two hundred thousand negro troops who volunteered under our flag and shouldered their muskets to do what they could for the unity of this Government and for their own liberties, there is not one of that sable host who is not more entitled to credit from the American people for what he suffered and endured than Andrew Johnson, yet he is continually reminding the people of the great sufferings and hardships he has endured. In his address to the negroes in this city the other day he made this modest statement in reference to the abolishment of slavery by the constitutional amendment:

"I feel, and know it to be so, that my efforts have contributed as much, if not more, in accomplishing this great national guarantee than those of any other living man in the United States."

Oh, sir, he had kind and cheering words for those men who marched, with the utterances of his lips still ringing in their ears, to Fort Pillow, where they were massacred, and to Port Hudson, where they fought and fell heroically. And, sir, upon the other battle-fields of this war the words of Andrew Johnson encouraged and cheered them to heroic deeds. But he has no such words for them now. We have had an illustration of that fact in his late speech to the negroes in this city when they were celebrating the anniversary of their emancipation.

In that speech, which I will not quote at length, but merely state its substance, he said to those negroes that he thanked them for this token of respect to him; that they had taken the pains to come through the presidential grounds and stop at the Executive Mansion and pay their personal respects to him. He did not repeat the declaration that he was going to be their Moses and lead them through the wilderness to the land of liberty. He did not tell them that he was going to stand by any of the pledges of the Government that they should be protected in their liberty in the States where they may live. No, sir; he made no such declaration; it would have been useless. His veto messages of the Freedmen's Bureau bill and the civil rights bill, the very measures of this Congress calculated to insure that protection, would have been witnesses against him.

In his letter to Governor Sharkey of August 15, 1865, he said:

"If you could extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English, and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250, and pay taxes thereon, you would completely disarm the adversary, and set an example the other States will follow. This you can do with perfect safety, and you thus place the southern States, in reference to free persons of color, upon the same basis with the free States."

This was encouraging to the poor souls who had worn the galling chains of bondage all their weary lives. But we hear nothing of this kind in his late speech.

In this speech he simply tells them, as he has often said before, what he has suffered and what he has done, and begs them to take upon credit the assertion that he will turn out some day to be their best friend. Well, sir, I do not believe in those who are friends on credit. I like a man who is a friend at the time when you need him; and if there ever was, in the history of this Government, a time when the loyal black people of this country—and they are all loyal—needed a friend it is now, when the South, being relieved from the military power of the Government, will seek to again enslave them, not perhaps by a sale on the auction-block as in the olden time, but by vagrant laws and other laws and regulations concerning the freedmen, which subject them to a surveillance, and will eventually subject them to a servitude little less degrading and no less galling than the old chains of slavery which they wore so long. Here is what the "restored" State of Mississippi has done already in this regard:

"1. 'An act to regulate the relation of master and apprentice, as relates to freedmen, freed negroes, and mulattoes.'"

"2. 'An act to amend the vagrant laws of the State.'"

"3. 'An act to punish certain offenses therein named, and for other purposes.'"

In the third act, section four is as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That all the penal and criminal laws now in force in this State, defining offenses and describing the modes of punishment for crimes and misdemeanors committed by slaves, free negroes, or mulattoes, be, and the same are hereby, reenacted and declared to be in full force and effect against freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes, except so far as the mode and manner of trial and punishment have been changed or altered by law."

"Some of the 'penal and criminal laws' which have been reenacted for the freedmen are as follows:

"Article fifty-eight, section eleven, page 248, Revised Code, makes it punishable with death for a negro to murder, commit rape, burn houses, commit robbery, or attempt to commit such crimes. White persons are not punishable with death for most of the offenses mentioned in this section, nor for the attempt to commit any one of them."

"Article forty-five, of the above named act, page 245, provides that a slave shall receive twenty lashes if he be found away from the place of his employment without a pass. This is reenacted for freedmen."

"Article forty-six, page 246, awards thirty-nine lashes to the slave for buying or selling without written permission. Reenacted for the freedmen."

"Article four hundred and seventy-six, page 24, allows civil officers, and others to appropriate to their own use any article a slave may be seeking to sell. Reenacted for the freedmen."

"Article fifty-one, page 247, makes it punishable for negroes to congregate at night, or hold schools, &c. Reenacted as above."

"Article sixty-three, page 249. Both ears are to be cut off for false witness. (No white ears to be served so.) Reenacted as above."

Here you have a fair sample of the legislation of a State which has "accepted the situation." Is such a State fit to be represented now in Congress? Let the loyal people answer!

Sir, the laws which have been passed by the southern States in reference to the freedmen are of the most degrading and oppressive character. I have given one sample; let that do for all; I have no time to present any more to the House. Many of those States have reenacted, it may be said, their old code of slave laws, simply striking out the word "slaves" and inserting the words "freedmen," "persons of color," "mulatto," &c., and giving them no more rights than if they were still chattels. So it would be in every single southern State, unless by the strong arm of this Government you protect the black man who aided in the preservation of the Republic, and the preservation of that Constitution which is now being sought to be used as an instrument for their oppression by the Executive of the United States!

He tells us that the passage of these laws for their protection was unconstitutional. Sir, has it come to this, that to protect the citizen's liberty under a republican form of government is unconstitutional? If it has, we had better have a new Constitution. I believe that it is one of the inherent powers of Government to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his liberty and in the security of person and in the rights of property, independent of all constitutions. It is an inherent power, a power that dwells in government without any written law—that in the language of the Constitution, that instrument was framed by the people of the United States in order "to establish justice," "insure domestic tranquillity," "provide for the common defense," "promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty," &c. Will it be said that it must be written in express terms in the Constitution, otherwise the Congress has no power to protect its citizens, without respect to color or race, in the enjoyment of that liberty said to be the prime object in founding the Government? No, sir, it is but the make-shift of the demagogue. It is a bid for the Presidency in 1868. It is a crumb—no, not a crumb, but a whole loaf—thrown to the southern people for their support in the convention of 1868.

We now have two great prestidigitators on the political tapis, performing all sorts of lofty tumbling in endeavoring to win the admiration of the Democratic convention (to be) in 1868. I will not say that the gentlemen to whom I refer are Andrew Johnson and William H. Seward, for no one would suppose that Seward, with his "higher-law" and "irrepressible-conflict" doctrines of the past, would stand a ghost of a chance, and he will not. The South will never touch him.

The other gentleman, in fact, stands no better chance than Seward. He has betrayed one party that trusted him, and no other party will ever give him a chance for a second betrayal. But the race between the two, their throwing of crumbs, and in fact whole loaves, to their southern friends, is quite amusing, and in the end, may be instructive. I have not the least confidence in the political probity of either of them.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am willing that the gentleman from Illinois shall proceed with his speech, provided I shall have the floor when he gets through.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that my colleague have his full hour after the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his speech.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am obliged to my friends from Pennsylvania for their consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to state that the subject upon which I shall speak is a dry one—the subject of the tariff—and will not interest the House as much as the one which the gentleman from Illinois is making. I have no desire to interfere with the enjoyment the House has in hearing the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, the truth is that the people are not so simple or so easily deceived as these gentlemen in high positions suppose. This game they are playing will be uncovered, it will be detected by the people and condemned. Their whole game involves an apostasy and an abandonment of the principles which they once announced, and which we, in common with them, believed and sustained, and yet believe and sustain.

Now, a word about this question of representation. I leave it to any gentleman on the other side of the House who is with the President on his reconstruction policy, whether or not, it is not held by him, and by those who support him, that the southern States are entitled to representation without conditions; that we have no right to impose conditions on the South precedent to their being represented in this Congress. That is their position, and that all you can ask is, whether the representatives can take the oath prescribed by law. Now that I have stated the question fairly, let me ask, when did this right of representation accrue to the southern States lately in rebellion? Was it last month or six months ago, or when was it?

I hold this to be the position of the Union party on that question—although I am unauthorized to speak for any but myself—that if the southern States are entitled to representation in Congress to-day they were entitled to representation in Congress the very day after the surrender of the rebel armies. What has been done to clothe them with rights with which they were not clothed on the cessation of hostilities? Nothing has been done by Congress giving them this right. Has the President a right to clothe the States with new powers? Or has he the constitutional right to restore powers once lost? That belongs to the legislative department of the Government, and not to the executive. Where under the Constitution does he get any legislative power? Nowhere. He claims that peace exists. Why? Because the rebels have ceased to fight; because their armies have been disbanded; because the rebel power has been crushed. Not by any act of Congress does peace exist, but simply by reason of the close of the war.

Does that fact give the right to these people of the southern States to representation? The President and the Democratic party say that it does. I deny it. It gives them no such right. If they had any right after the surrender of Lee, it was not by virtue of any action of the President. He can confer no such right upon them.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman want an answer to that question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am going to answer it myself. The Constitution clothes the President with no such power. He cannot make a citizen of an alien. He cannot make a naturalization law. Those people in the southern States became aliens by virtue of their rebellion and treason, and he cannot restore them to citizenship. It requires a greater than he. The legislative power of the country is the only power that can restore them to citizenship, the right of which they have forfeited.

Then what follows? Unless the rebels were entitled to representation in Congress immediately upon the surrender of the rebel army they are not entitled to it to-day unless Congress has intervened and by appropriate legislation has given them that right, and we all know that Congress has done nothing of the kind.

And here let me say that the President himself once recognized the fact that the rebels lost their political rights; that their State governments had ceased to exist by reason of their rebellion and treason; that they had no power inherent in themselves to resuscitate those governments; that they were no longer citizens of the United States but were alien enemies, conquered by the Federal power. That was his position less than one year ago, as I will prove.

The present President recognized the effect of the rebellion upon the southern people in the forfeiture of their political and civil rights by stepping in, in the absence of Congress, and proclaiming to these men what to do, and directing them to do it; by appointing over them provisional governors; by pardoning rebels for the purpose of making them Governors; by instructing them how to exercise the duties of their office; by telling them to call the people together in convention, and what kind of a constitution to make; by declaring who should and who should not vote, who should and who should not hold office; in short, by directing from beginning to end what the people should and what they should not do. What was that but a clear recognition of the forfeiture of their political and civil rights?

Now, I maintain that if the States wherein he exercised that power were States within the Union, or in the Union as he now claims they were, and that they were never out of the Union, then he was a usurper, an invader of State rights in undertaking to control them in the slightest degree. If they were States in the Union by what authority did he go into them and do what he did? It was in violation of their constitutions that existed prior to the rebellion. He set those State constitutions aside, he disregarded them; he called new conventions without authority of State laws, simply as the executive head of this nation, without any authority expressed in the Constitution, and against the constitutional rights of the States thus invaded. If they were States in the Union, and entitled at that time to representation in Congress, he had no more authority to go there and revamp their old constitutions, or refurbish them, or dictate new laws and designate men to execute those laws in South Carolina, Georgia, and Mississippi, than he had in Wisconsin, Indiana, and Illinois. He would not dare to go into any of the northern States and tell the people to call a convention, saying that such a portion were citizens and entitled to vote, and such a portion not, and calling upon them to incorporate such and such provisions and expunge others from their State constitutions. He would be denounced as a usurper for undertaking to do such an act, and would be hung as a traitor unless he could find a pardoning power like that he exercises now.

Upon his own hypothesis, he has no more right to invade a rebel State than a loyal one, and every proclamation he has made and every act he has done in regard to the southern States since the cessation of hostilities has been a violation of their rights under the Constitution of the United States.

But I believe that he has not been a usurper to the extent that his own position indicates. He says they are entitled to representation now. So does the party that supports him. We say, on the other hand, that the men who sought to destroy this Government have no right to a voice in making the laws which direct the manner or mode of reconstructing their States.

Sir, it is a principle which the world will acquiesce in, which the people of this country will sustain, that the heroic people of the loyal States, who subdued this rebellion, shall, through their representatives in Congress, dictate the terms upon which the southern people shall be represented in Congress. And we must stand by that principle, for I would not give a rush for the Government, unless it can be preserved by the heroic and persistent effort of the northern people from the overwhelming ruin which these southern men would inevitably bring upon it if they should now be permitted to assume control of national affairs. Restore these unrepentant sinners to Congress, with Andrew Johnson standing by them, and with the support of those who are here ready to receive them with open arms, and your country will be on the down grade to certain destruction.

Why, sir, do you suppose that the people we have subjugated are coming here to Congress to vote a repudiation of their debt? Do you imagine that they are going to forget their own rebel soldiers who have been disabled in the war, or the widows and orphans of their own soldiers? Think you they are going to vote for a constitutional prohibition upon the claims of their own people, who sacrificed their treasure and their blood in the war against this Government? No! every man of them will vote to assume the rebel debt and pension the disabled rebel soldiers, and the widows and children of those who lost their lives in the rebel cause, and pay for the property that has been destroyed by our armies that marched through the South.

And when Congress votes to do all that the bankruptcy of this Government is achieved, your own loyal debt is repudiated, and the credit of your Government is annihilated. You will no longer be able to pay the pensions to your own disabled soldiers, or the widows and orphans that have been caused by this war. The vote of the southern Representatives will impoverish your Treasury and wide-spread ruin will follow. Loyal men of the North, are you prepared to welcome the rebel States into your Congress now?

God forbid that that day should come. The loyal people of this country have suffered too much to endure that humiliation and disgrace. I appeal not to Andrew Johnson, because I feel that it would be appealing in vain. I appeal to the people to stand by their Representatives until we have put it beyond the power of the rebels of the South and their northern sympathizers to destroy this Government. And let us, the Representatives of the people, legislate for the interest of the country and of freedom. We must place such safeguards around this Government as shall secure its perpetuity, its grandeur, and its glory for all coming time.

Wait a little while, gentlemen on the other side. Do not be too anxious to allow this southern Samson to put his hands upon the pillars of this temple. You, too, may be crushed in the ruin as well as we. For your own sakes as well as ours let these southern Representatives stay out a little while until loyalty in their States gets a better foothold; until they shall send loyal men here; and if they have not the inherent sense of justice to do justice themselves, let us impose upon them such constitutional obligations as shall require them to do justice to all men, of all conditions, the low as well as the high; as shall require them to maintain a republican form of State government. Then, sir, I would admit them, but not till then. But till then let the same heroism, devotion, patriotism, and courage control and direct the legislation of the country for the preservation of that Government and that Constitution which has been saved by the indescribable valor of half a million heroes now sleeping their last sleep, and by that million of veteran survivors who are among us to remind us of their heroism and courage, and then not only will the present generation bless you, but future generations will treasure up your acts in grateful hearts, and God Himself will also add His blessing.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. For how long?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think not more than five minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I will yield for that time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have listened to the vehement declarations of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] against the President.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL]?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has animadverted pretty severely upon the President on account of some alleged change of opinions. I desire to have read a passage from the Peoria Weekly Democrat, and then inquire of the gentleman if he has not somewhat changed his opinions.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is that a copperhead paper?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose you would call it so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I deny its authority in toto. I would just exactly as soon—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not want to be interrupted by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest that I yielded only to my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to have this read.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. At the request of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] I will ask the Clerk to read the extract referred to. I am not responsible for it in any respect, for I do not know what it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Soon after the first battle of Bull Run he ventured out as far as Fairfax Court-House, and there was made acquainted with some of his secess friends. On his return to Peoria he declared in substance that 'the people of Virginia were the noblest men of God's creation, and that the Government might as well attempt to pluck the stars from the heavens as to crush them, fighting, as they believed they were, for their rights and liberties.'"

"About three weeks before the last nomination of Mr. Lovejoy to Congress, Mr. INGERSOLL stated that 'his defeat by a conservative man would be worth fifty thousand men to the cause of the Union.'"

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. After I get through the gentleman can answer that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to answer it now, just where it is read.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I will yield if my colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] is willing, for I hold the floor by his courtesy.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am willing that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] should have a short time to reply to what has been read.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose this paper, from which the Clerk has read, is the copperhead paper of my town, Peoria.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is the paper that supported the Union during the war, and now supports the Union and Andrew Johnson. It is the organ of the party that has just succeeded in carrying the election in that town.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The same old copperhead paper?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The same old paper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I supposed it was the same old paper. I have been used to being vilified and abused by that little, mean, dirty, despicable sheet; a mean, miserable, dirty, lying, contemptible party paper of the meanest, most contemptible, and lowest stripe imaginable. It is a paper that cannot be excelled in meanness and lying and slandering in regard to the Union cause and Union men by any paper in rebellion during the entire war. It is a filthy, dirty, lying—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman deny the statement in that paper?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] just now. Sir, the statement which has just been read, whether contained in that paper or in any other, is false from beginning to end. I never saw one of these Virginia rebels during the war, to my knowledge; never. If I had, and the occasion had offered, I should have said to him what I have said to-day. My utterances would have been just the same as they were in 1862, when, as a candidate for Congress for the State at large on her Union ticket, I received the abuse and vilification of that same contemptible, blackguard, copperhead, Andrew Johnson paper, [laughter,] just as I receive it to-day. I then canvassed the State of Illinois, and met with just such slanders, not only from that paper but from the Memphis Avalanche and the Richmond Enquirer. They are all of a stripe and seek the same end, the elevation of the copperhead party to power, even, if need be, it is upon the ruins of the Republic.

Sir, never since the first utterances of treason in this country have my lips ever uttered one word, except in encouragement of the loyal North in their efforts to suppress the rebellion, and in denunciation of treason wherever it has reared its head, whether it be in the Halls of Congress, in the representative capacity of gentlemen who come here from northern States, or whether it be in the northern press, or where ever it may have been. I have been an uncompromising foe of every enemy of the Government, of every enemy of the Union party, whether he has been engaged in lauding Vallandigham or organizing Golden Circles throughout the northern States, or whether he had nothing better to do than to vilify the soldiers that were fighting for the holiest of causes by calling them "Lincoln hirelings." My voice has ever been for the Union and those who have fought for it. I wish I could say as much for the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to-day with some interest to the vehement declamation of the gentleman from Illinois against the President. The gentleman has drawn his sword against the President, perhaps never to be sheathed until death ensues. I do not mean death by atrocious assassination; I mean political death only. I am not the defender of the President. He needs no defender. I judge that he is quite able, and I trust that he will be quite ready to defend himself against this strong, and I must add vindictive, bill of indictment against him. The characteristics which he has displayed in former life would give reason to expect that he will exhibit the same characteristics again.

But, sir, I rise as a friend of fair play. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois has charged the President of the United States with the desertion of the principles upon which he was elected. I desire to present here the Baltimore platform upon which Andrew Johnson was elected, so that those who read the gentleman's remarks may be able to judge of their truth and to decide for themselves who has adhered to that platform and who has not.

The Baltimore platform is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain against all their enemies the integrity of the Union and the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that, laying aside all differences of political opinions, we pledge ourselves as Union men, animated by a common sentiment, and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling by force of arms the rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the rebels and traitors arrayed against it.

Resolved, That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with rebels, nor to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an "unconditional surrender" of their hostility and a return to their just allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that we call upon the Government to maintain this position, and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigor to the complete suppression of the rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrifice, the patriotism, the heroic valor, and the undying devotion of the American people to the country and its free institutions.

Resolved, That as slavery was the cause, and now constitutes the strength of this rebellion, and as it must be always and everywhere hostile to the principles of republican government, justice and the national safety demand its utter and complete extirpation from the soil of the Republic; and that we uphold and maintain the acts and proclamations by which the Government, in its own defense, has aimed a death blow at this gigantic evil. We are in favor, furthermore, of such an amendment to the Constitution, to be made by the people in conformity with its provisions, as shall terminate and forever prohibit the existence of slavery within the limits of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Resolved, That the thanks of the American people are due to the soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy, who have periled their lives in defense of their country, and in vindication of the honor of the flag; that the nation owes to them some permanent recognition of their patriotism and valor, and ample and permanent provision for those of their survivors who have received disabling and honorable wounds in the service of the country, and that the memories of those who have fallen in its defense shall be held in grateful and everlasting remembrance.

Resolved, That we approve and applaud the practical wisdom, the unselfish patriotism, and unswerving fidelity to the Constitution and the principles of American liberty with which Abraham Lincoln has discharged under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty the great duties and responsibilities of the presidential office; that we approve and indorse, as demanded by the emergency and essential to the preservation of the nation, and as within the Constitution, the measures and acts which he has adopted to defend the nation against its open and secret foes; that we approve especially the proclamation of emancipation, and the employment as Union soldiers of men heretofore held in slavery; and that we have full confidence in his determination to carry these and all other constitutional measures essential to the salvation of the country into full and complete effect.

Resolved, That we deem it essential to the general welfare that harmony should prevail in the national councils, and we regard as worthy of public confidence and official trust those only who cordially indorse the principles proclaimed in these resolutions, and which should characterize the administration of the Government.

Resolved, That the Government owes to all men employed in its armies, without regard to distinction of color, the full protection of the laws of war; and that any violation of these laws, or of the usages of civilized nations in the time of war by the rebels now in arms, should be made the subject of full and prompt redress.

Resolved, That the foreign immigration, which in the past has added so much to the wealth and development of the resources and increase of power to this nation, the asylum of the oppressed of all nations, should be fostered and encouraged by a liberal and just policy.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the speedy construction of a railroad to the Pacific.

Resolved, That the national debt, pledged for the redemption of the public debt, must be kept inviolate; and that for this purpose we recommend economy and rigid responsibility in the public expenditures, and a vigorous and just system of taxation; that it is the duty of every loyal State to sustain the credit and promote the use of the national currency.

Resolved, That we approve the position taken by the Government that the people of the United States never regarded with indifference the attempt of any European Power to overthrow by force, or to supplant by fraud, the institutions of any republican Government on the western continent; and that they view with extreme jealousy, as menacing to the peace and independence of this our country, the efforts of any such Power to obtain new footholds for monarchical Governments, sustained by foreign military force, in near proximity to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to present here, if I had it by me, the Chicago platform of 1860, in order to show the gentleman from Illinois his own inconsistencies and those of the party to which he belongs.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does not the gentleman mean the Chicago platform of 1864?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I mean the Chicago platform of 1860, on which Mr. Lincoln was nominated, and in which a just maintenance of the rights of the States is announced as a distinct principle to which the party is pledged.

So much, sir, for the inconsistencies of the gentleman's party. Now, as to the question which he asks whether we were in favor of admitting Representatives from the South, and when that right of representation ceased, if it ever ceased. Sir, I maintain that the right of representation as belonging to the loyal people of the South has never ceased. The gentleman himself must be aware that, upon this principle Representatives from the State of Tennessee were admitted here in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, one of those Representatives being one of the gentlemen who are now claiming seats upon this floor as Representatives from that State. Sir, if those three Representatives, after the State of Tennessee had seceded, had a right to come here and be admitted as Representatives of the loyal people of the State of Tennessee, when and why did that right cease? Representatives from the State of Virginia were also admitted by the same Congress. If Virginia had the right to be represented in that Congress, when and how did her right of representation cease?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I understand the gentleman, he claims that he is now supporting Andrew Johnson's policy.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have not claimed anything with reference to supporting Andrew Johnson.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, the gentleman does claim that Andrew Johnson has not changed his political principles.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have referred the gentleman to the Baltimore platform, which, I hold, corresponds precisely with the line of policy which was pursued with reference to "restoration" by Mr. Lincoln during the entire period of his Presidency, and which, if I have understood correctly the declaration of the Secretary of War, Mr. Lincoln would have continued to follow, had he lived. And that platform is in entire harmony with the policy now pursued by Andrew Johnson. So far as I am able to judge, his course in the work of restoration presents no inconsistency with the Baltimore platform or with his letter of acceptance written in response to his nomination at Baltimore.

Sir, that letter of acceptance was as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, July 2, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: Your communication of the 9th ultimo, informing me of my nomination for the Vice Presidency of the United States, by the National Union Convention held at Baltimore, and inclosing a copy of the resolutions adopted by that body, was not received until the 25th ultimo.

A reply on my part had been previously made to the action of the convention in presenting my name, in a speech delivered in this city, on the evening succeeding the day of the adjournment of the convention, in which I indicated my acceptance of the distinguished honor conferred by that body, and defined the grounds upon which that acceptance was based, substantially saying what I now have to say. From the comments made upon that speech by the various presses of the country, to which my attention has been directed, I consider it to be regarded as a full acceptance.

In view, however, of the desire expressed in your communication, I will more fully allude to a few points that have been heretofore presented. My opinion on the leading questions at present agitating and distracting the public mind, and especially in reference to the rebellion now being waged against the Government and authority of the United States, I presume, are generally understood. Before the southern people assumed a belligerent attitude, (and frequently since,) I took occasion most frankly to declare the views I then entertained in relation to the wicked purposes of the southern politicians. They have since undergone but little if any change. Time and subsequent events have rather confirmed than diminished my confidence in their correctness.

At the beginning of this great struggle I entertained the same opinion of it I do now, and in my place in the Senate, I denounced it as treason worthy the punishment of death, and warned the Government and people of the impending danger. But my voice was not heard or counsel heeded until it was too late to avert the storm. It still continued to gather over us without molestation from the authorities at Washington until at length it broke with all its fury upon the country. And now, if we would save the Government from being overwhelmed by it, we must meet it in the true spirit of patriotism, and bring traitors to the punishment due their crime, and by force of arms crush out and subdue the last vestige of rebel authority in every State. I felt then, as now, that the destruction of the Government was deliberately determined upon by wicked and designing conspirators, whose lives and fortunes were pledged to carry it out, and that no compromise, short of an unconditional recognition of the independence of the southern States could have been, or could now be, proposed which they would accept. The clamor for "southern rights," as the rebel journals were pleased to designate their rallying cry, was not to secure their assumed rights in the Union and under the Constitution, but to disrupt the Government, and establish an independent organization based upon slavery, which they could at all times control.

The separation of the Government has for years been the cherished purpose of the southern leaders. Baffled in 1832 by the stern, patriotic heroism of Andrew Jackson, they sullenly acquiesced, only to mature their diabolical schemes and await the recurrence of a more favorable opportunity to execute them. Then the pretext was the tariff, and Jackson, after foiling their schemes of nullification and disunion, with prophetic perspicacity, warned the country against the renewal of their efforts to dismember the Government.

In a letter dated May 1, 1833, to Rev. A. J. Crawford, after demonstrating the heartless insincerity of the southern nullifiers, he said:

"Therefore the tariff was only a pretext, and disunion and a southern confederacy the real object. The next pretext will be the negro or slavery question."

Time has fully verified this prediction, and we have now not only "the negro, or slavery question" as the pretext, but the real cause of the rebellion; and both must go down together. It is vain to attempt to reconstruct the Union with the distracting element of slavery in it. Experience has demonstrated its incompatibility with free and republican Governments, and it would be unwise and unjust longer to continue it as one of the institutions of the country. While it remained subordinate to the Constitution and laws of the United States I yielded to it my support, but when it became rebellious and attempted to rise above the Government and control its action, I threw my humble influence against it.

The authority of the Government is supreme, and will admit of no rivalry. No institution can rise above it, whether it be slavery or any other organized power. In our happy form of government all must be subordinate to the will of the people, when reflected through the Constitution and laws made pursuant thereto, State or Federal. This great principle lies at the foundation of every Government, and cannot be disregarded without the destruction of the Government itself. In the support and practice of correct principles we can never reach wrong results, and by rigorously adhering to this great fundamental truth the end will be the preservation of the Union and the overthrow of an institution which has made war upon and attempted the destruction of the Government itself.

The mode by which this great change—the emancipation of the slave—can be effected, is properly found in the power to amend the Constitution of the United States. This plan is effectual and of no doubtful authority; and while it does not contravene the timely exercise of the war power by the President in his emancipation proclamation, it comes stamped with the authority of the people themselves, acting in accordance with the written rule of the supreme law of the land, and must, therefore, give more general satisfaction and quietude to the distracted public mind.

By recurring to the principles contained in the resolutions so unanimously adopted by the convention I find that they substantially accord with my public acts and opinions heretofore made known and expressed, and are therefore most cordially indorsed and approved; and the nomination having been conferred without any solicitation on my part it is with the greater pleasure accepted.

In accepting the nomination, I might here close, but I cannot forego the opportunity of saying to my old friends of the Democratic party proper, with whom I have so long and pleasantly been associated, that the hour has now come when that great party can justly vindicate its devotion to true democratic policy and measures of expediency. The war is a war of great principles. It involves the supremacy and life of the Government itself. If the rebellion triumphs, free government North and South fails. If, on the other hand, the Government is successful, as I do not doubt, its destiny is fixed, its basis permanent and enduring, and its career of honor and glory just begun. In a great contest like this for the existence of free government, the path of duty is patriotism and principle. Minor considerations and questions of administrative policy should give way to the higher duty of first preserving the Government, and then there will be time enough to wrangle over the men and measures pertaining to its administration.

This is not the hour for strife and division among ourselves. Such differences of opinion only encourage the enemy, prolong the war, and waste the country. Unity of action and concentration of power should be our watchword and rallying cry. This accomplished, the time will rapidly approach when their armies in the field—the great power of rebellion—will be broken and crushed by our gallant officers and brave soldiers, and ere long they will return to their homes and firesides to resume again the avocations of peace with the proud consciousness that they have aided in the noble work of reestablishing upon a surer and more permanent basis the great temple of American freedom.

I am, gentlemen, with sentiments of high regard, yours truly,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Hon. WILLIAM DENNISON, Chairman, and others, Committee of the National Union Convention.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show the reason why I ask permission to put a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will state what I understand him to state: that Andrew Johnson had not changed from the platform of the party upon which he was elected in 1864; but the party who elected him then, and oppose him now, has changed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir, I think you have changed; that your party has shown the cloven foot; that they never expressed any purpose before the people to do what they have since done.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Has not your party changed in so far that your party opposed Andrew Johnson in 1864?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has a Yankee way of answering one question by asking another. [Laughter.] If the gentleman will answer my question perhaps he may have a right to ask another.

One remark more and I will yield the floor. I want to say there are but two positions to occupy, according to my apprehension, as to the question of the restoration of the Union, the principle enunciated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] at an early part of this session, that these States are conquered provinces and we can therefore do what we please with them; and on the other hand, the Constitution of the United States and the decision of the Supreme Court, as delivered by Judge Grier, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] himself has quoted to-day to sustain his argument, in which that court determined that these States had not by reason of the treason of any individual in any manner been interfered with in their status as States. That is the gentleman's own decision of which he quotes, and that is the decision of the highest tribunal known to the country.

And I now say, as an humble member of the Democratic party, so far as I have been able to judge, it represents the conservative sentiment of the country. I claim to be a conservative Democrat myself, and not such a Democrat as the gentleman has described, not such as the gentleman would charge with treason, for, on the contrary, I represent a Democracy as loyal as the gentleman from Illinois. I represent, sir, a people who went with as much zeal and perhaps as far as the gentleman from Illinois in bearing arms to put down this rebellion. I am not a defender of rebellion in any particular. I am against anybody who seeks to overthrow the Government or the Constitution; and while I was in favor of putting down the rebellion when it emanated from the South, I am now to-day in favor of preventing the success and for putting down that party which seeks to change, to annul, and to destroy the Constitution and to centralize this Government, and thereby to take away from the people the privileges which that Constitution formed by our forefathers gave to them. The gentleman from Illinois belongs to that party, and he will allow me to say, a party which does not seek any immediate restoration of this Union. They find that Andrew Johnson seeks that restoration in good faith.

His spirit of loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution is far different from that evinced by the Republican party. It is far different from that spirit of the gentleman's party which pressed through hurriedly the admission of the State of Colorado with two Senators in the other branch of Congress, simply because those two Senators will make up the two-thirds vote in the Senate and enable the Opposition party to be equal to any emergency against the conduct of the President in defending the Constitution of the United States. Yes, sir, that State was admitted into the Union, so far as the votes of the two Houses can go, when it has not as many inhabitants, I venture to say, as there are voters in my own district.

That is the party against which we are arrayed. It is the party which the people must overthrow before they can expect any full restoration of this Government. We can never have a continued peace until the principles embodied by Andrew Johnson in his veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, his veto of the civil rights bill, and his speech of the 22d of February last shall guide this country in a restoration of the Union of these States.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I like that Christian virtue called patience, and have tried to exercise it toward my friend over the way.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am much obliged to the gentleman for his kindness. I knew his patience and his kindness of old, but perhaps I have encroached upon them too much.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Not at all. I yielded more readily to the gentleman because he claimed to represent the Democratic party, and I wanted him to have the privilege of defending his friends, as he has done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman's permission, before I enter upon the subject which I intend to discuss, I propose to ask him a question in reference to the very subject he has adverted to. The gentleman says, and I do not controvert it, that he comes from a loyal district in Pennsylvania, and that his constituency are as loyal as that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] I want him to tell this House whether he supports to-day the Democratic candidate in Pennsylvania for Governor, Heister Clymer.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do; and I expect to do so with all my heart, because I believe his election will aid in the restoration of the Union.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I only wanted a categorical answer.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. You have got it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I will now refer to a scene which has come up vividly before my mind since my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] commenced his speech—a scene which occurred three years ago or more in the Senate of Pennsylvania—when I heard Andrew Johnson slandered and vilified more than I ever heard any man abused in a public body by that same Heister Clymer and his Democratic associates. I have the speech here. I was told that the Senator was careful to suppress some parts of it, but in that speech he assailed Andrew Johnson in the strongest terms, declaring him utterly unworthy of the confidence of the Democratic party. And why was it that he made that assault on Andrew Johnson? Because we were disposed to honor him by giving him the use of the hall of the Senate of our State in which he could be heard in defense of the war. The Democratic party refused to vote for it; they would not even permit his voice to be heard in that hall in favor of the cause of his country.

A motion was first made in the House that Andrew Johnson, and Governor Wright, of Indiana, should have the use of the hall of the House in that dark hour of the country, and how was that motion met by the representatives of the great Democratic party, who are now, or claim to be, the special friends of the President? It was defeated by their votes, and then presented in the Senate. I have no disposition to join in any vituperation against the President. I am far from indorsing some of the utterances of my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] in his speech to-day in regard to Andrew Johnson. I shall never engage in any personal abuse of any man who may be opposed to the policy of the party with which I act. But, sir, I say that this same Democratic party, led on by this same Heister Clymer in Pennsylvania, were opposed to allowing Andrew Johnson an opportunity to be heard in the hall of the Senate of Pennsylvania, and that the very same leaders have been here in this capital, and I have met them in the presence of the President of the United States, asking, as I suppose, for his interference in the State in favor of their party. These very men abused him two years ago as I never heard a public man abused in a public assembly, as I had occasion to know, for I was in the chair at the time, and was compelled several times to call them to order on account of their low abuse of a man that I supposed then to be, and still hope that I may be permitted to call, a patriot.

[Here Mr. WARNER handed Mr. LAWRENCE the speech referred to.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that the gentleman have leave to print it, so that it may go to the country along with the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] to see which is the worst.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have not said anything against the President, and shall not.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am not alluding to your remarks.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I say that the men who were the enemies and traducers of Andrew Johnson in my own State, the copperhead party, who have held their secret cabals day and night, who have conspired against the Government, are now swarming around the President, getting down on their knees like scyophants, and asking for crumbs. I have seen them myself. And I have been told on good authority, and I believe it, that some of those who, a few weeks ago, nominated Mr. Clymer, came here to see if the influence of Andrew Johnson could not be had to carry that State for the Democracy in the coming contest.

Now, this is not saying anything against Andrew Johnson. I am telling who they were who abused him at that time, and who were his enemies. Those men to-day repudiate, as I suppose my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] does, the Baltimore platform; although my friend commends Andrew Johnson because he says he stands on that platform. And yet did my friend and colleague support and approve that Baltimore platform? I have no doubt he denounced it in every Democratic club-room in the city of Philadelphia, the very platform on which he says Andrew Johnson now stands.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The Democratic party of Pennsylvania are not responsible for everything that Mr. Heister Clymer may say in his individual capacity. [Laughter.] Moreover, let me say that the Democratic party of Pennsylvania indorsed Andrew Johnson in their resolutions, because they believe his policy of restoration will give us once more a united country, and only on that ground.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. And the same party in my State sustained Vallandigham and indorsed him.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. When?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In their State convention, in 1863. And I doubt whether we could have carried the State for Governor Curtin but for that full indorsement of Vallandigham.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand my colleague's authority for that assertion.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I give my pledge, if the gentleman will accept that.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will accept the gentleman's pledge for forty-eight hours.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In the convention that nominated Woodward for Governor, against Curtin, a resolution was passed congratulating the Democratic party of Ohio on their nomination of Vallandigham. And if that is not so I will agree to give the gentleman—

Mr. SMITH. Twenty cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. More than that; I will give a basket of champagne.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken. The convention denounced the arrest and manner of incarceration of Mr. Vallandigham.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am astonished that my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] has such a short memory. I have had occasion to read that resolution before tens of thousands of the people of Pennsylvania; I have had occasion to refer to it more than fifty times. I do not misrepresent the Democratic party, nor do I misrepresent Mr. Clymer, who is a personal friend and an honest man. He has voted consistently and at all times against the war policy of the Government, and against making appropriations to feed and clothe the soldiers who were fighting for the Government; he has always sustained the copperhead party and its friends in the State of Pennsylvania. He is and has been a consistent leader of that party, and stands to-day as the candidate of that party in our State for Governor; a party, the members of which did all they dared to do, and keep out of prison, to hand us over to the rebels in the South.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] if it is not his wish as well as the wish of every loyal man in the country, I presume, that all men should be loyal and obey the laws and sustain the Constitution and the union of the States. Is not that his wish?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. That is my wish, certainly. And I should be very glad to see those punished who did not do so. And I would like to see some of them hung, and could name about twenty of them myself for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH. And I could double the number.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. And I do not know but I could name some in Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH. And I would double that, too. But I would ask the gentleman, if he finds men disposed and willing and anxious to obey the laws, and do obey them to all intents and purposes, would he have any cause of complaint against them?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman expect me to have any faith in the Democratic party repenting of their sins? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Allow me, if you please.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman referred to them.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; I am not in the Clymer controversy at all. I do not know anything about it. I speak of those who are willing to obey the laws, and I do not come within the purview of the gentleman's rule of punishment. As to hanging the leading traitors, I am as much in favor of that as the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to take up so much time. I was drawn into this discussion, as the gentleman from Kentucky is aware, by the remarks of my colleague.

Mr. SMITH. I disclaim any intention to interfere in the controversy between the gentleman and his colleague. I was only asking a question with reference to the point of repentance and confession, whether the gentleman would forgive a man on that ground.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Certainly I would, so far as I am personally concerned; but I would not, for that reason, exempt all the traitors from the just penalty of their crimes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a dozen gentlemen around me are calling for the reading of the speech of Heister Clymer, to which I have referred, and which is just handed to me by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WARNER.] How he happened to have it I know not. In compliance with their wishes, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the Legislative Record, the official report of the debates in the Pennsylvania Legislature.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. CLYMER: Mr. Speaker, on this day, at this hour, in this place, a great issue is on trial, fraught with the interests, not only of the present, but of the future; and if I, in the decision of this issue, have acted a part, however unimportant, I shall hereafter look back to this day, to this hour, and to this place, with feelings of no little gratification."

"What is the question presented? It is a proposition to invite Andrew Johnson, the so-called Governor of Tennessee, to address the people of Pennsylvania from the Senate chamber of this State. I have various reasons for opposing this proposition. In the first place, I here boldly proclaim that he is not at this hour and never has been, by the Constitution or under the laws, the Governor of the State of Tennessee, except when years ago he was elected to that office by the people. I say, sir, that his appointment by the President of the United States to that position was a usurpation of power on the part of the President, and that there is no warrant under the Constitution, no authority in the laws for his appointment; and that every act which he has assumed to perform by virtue of his unconstitutional and illegal appointment has been in derogation of the rights of a sovereign State, and in flat violation of the Constitution of the United States.

"I say, sir, furthermore, that no such position as military governor of a State is known to the Constitution of the United States; that there is nothing in that instrument which authorizes the President of the United States to appoint a military governor of any State; and that to make such an appointment was to create the State of Tennessee a military province; and that his appointment was made to carry out and subvert the purposes of the present Administration, which is to reduce all the States of this Union to the condition of mere dependencies of a consolidated oligarchy or despotism. That is my position, so far as concerns this pretended Governor of Tennessee. Andrew Johnson has not been for years, and is not now, the Governor of that State; and I will never recognize him as such by voting for this resolution.

"But, sir, without regard to any question of his official position, take Andrew Johnson as an individual, assuming that he is rightfully clothed with the robes of office and may constitutionally exercise the duties of that high position; even then, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I never by my vote will allow a man to come into these halls and from this place speak to the people of this great State in support of what I know to be illegal, unconstitutional, and tyrannical acts of the Federal Government. I know, sir, that Andrew Johnson has gone as far as the farthest, and is ready to go still further, to destroy, to uproot, to overturn every principle upon which this great and good Government of ours was founded. I know that he has bent with suppliant knee before the throne of power; I know that for self or some other consideration, he has succumbed to every measure presented to him for approval or disapproval; and I know that in speeches delivered in the capitals of other States he has enunciated doctrines which, if adopted by the people of the great North, would be subversive of individual freedom and personal right. Sir, by no vote of mine can any person holding such views address the people of Pennsylvania in this chamber. Never, sir, never, so long as I have a right to forbid him."

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. As the language to which I have referred does not appear in that speech, it is proper that I should say that Mr. Clymer and others suppressed a portion of the most objectionable part of their speeches. But from the whole tenor of that speech, the House will observe that it was a repudiation of Andrew Johnson, not only personally and politically, but officially.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield to me a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. For what purpose?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That I may have read a document which I wish to go to the public along with the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It will take only a minute.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows very well that I have not much time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The document which I desire to have read is the platform upon which Heister Clymer was nominated as a candidate for Governor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have seen that platform over and over again. It is an utter abandonment of all the old positions of the Democratic party.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It is a good Union platform.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. But, sir, of what use is a platform which every one knows to consist simply of hypocritical professions? Sir, the platform which that party has adopted in Pennsylvania for campaign purposes is a card representing Clymer supporting a white man, while General Geary, that heroic man, who traveled with Sherman through the South, and returned victoriously, is represented as holding up, or perhaps embracing, a negro.

Sir, the only capital of the Democratic party to-day in Pennsylvania is the negro question. They attempt to appeal to the lowest passions and prejudices of the ignorant and debased with regard to the negro. Because some of us representing here the State of Pennsylvania voted for negro suffrage, as an experiment, and to enable them to compete with returned rebels in this District, our names are paraded as friends of the negro in preference to the white man. In this, with the tricks of demagogues, that party appeal to passion and prejudice, and not to judgment and reason.

Now, I say that is the platform upon which these men stand. It is published in every Democratic paper in the State. I eulogized President Johnson when these men were denouncing him. I stood by him at that time, in Harrisburg, when he made one of the most able arguments that I ever heard in defense of the Constitution and the right of the Government to put down this rebellion. I followed him then; I followed him in Tennessee, when he stood like an oak stricken in the forest, when he was driven from home, and his family were scattered. I stood by him then, and I stood by him as the candidate of the Republican party in the last campaign. I helped to elect him. I would be glad, sir, to say that I indorsed every act of his Administration. I do not, and I cannot. I came here as anxious as my friend from Illinois that we should be united, that the President and Congress should stand together in this great issue. I knew the assaults we had to meet from the Democratic party. I knew they were thirsting for the loaves and fishes. I knew they would use every effort to secure possession of the Government. I was anxious that we should stand upon the platform of the party which would save us from this humiliation and disgrace. I did all a man could do to stand by the President, and, as some of my friends know, I subjected myself to suspicion and reproach from some of my radical friends, because I did not indorse all their policy. I regretted to hear the President abused early in the session. I was anxious we should be kept together; but after his speech of the 22d of February, and after his veto of the civil rights bill, I found I could not go for his whole policy without degrading myself and losing my own self-respect.

And I say here, in the presence of the nation, that my district that voted for him was in favor of sustaining his Administration until by some of his own acts, and by means of the copperhead party all over the land, he succeeded in destroying that confidence which I desired to cultivate; and to-day I have the gratification to know, although I represent a doubtful district, that the President, by the removal of pure, honest, and patriotic men, and by pardoning men covered all over with crime, who have been guilty of treason to the country, and by suffering himself to be led astray by our opponents, has made it necessary for the Union men to stand together in support of the general policy we sustain here, and they are as earnest and as powerful as when they sustained Andrew Johnson for the Vice Presidency of the United States. They stand in opposition to the general policy of the President, and in favor of the general policy pursued by the party in Congress, and I stand there with them. I am not going to abandon my principles to follow the lead of any man. I was willing to yield something for peace and harmony. When war is made upon us, when it comes upon the wings of the wind every morning and every evening, when we are attacked upon all sides, when attacks are made upon our people because they are not willing to bear the yoke, I cannot support the policy.

Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse the President personally. I never do that thing. I predict, with the honorable gentleman from Illinois, that we need not fear the contest. We live in an age of advancement, when bibles and churches and school-houses are scattered all over the land, when men are expected to respect a man because he is a man, when men are expected to do justice to all men, white or black; and I say the day is not far distant when this miserable copperhead party, that has no love of principle, that does not stand by its professed principles during more than one campaign, that has changed them in my own State twenty times within my own knowledge, when this Democratic party that derided Johnson, that slandered Lincoln—yes, sir, for they did deride, vilify, and slander him all over the land, calling him a low buffoon, while to-day they come up and hypocritically sing praises to his memory—I say that the day is not far distant when this Democratic party will sink into oblivion covered with the curses of the people it has deceived.

This same party rallies around President Johnson by night and by day. Go to the White House any time you please and you will be sure to see some of them, and always the shadow of some of the Blairs. [Laughter.] I have scarcely ever gone there without meeting some one of the family. I have seen the old man, who is almost ready to fall into the grave, there. It was the same during Lincoln's administration; he was always there trying to lead the President away from the people, in order to give office to the family.

I feel like the man in my own State at the time that President Jackson removed the deposits. He said, "I didn't wish General Jackson any harm; but I shouldn't care if the Almighty took a fancy for him." [Laughter.]

No family in this land so few in number has done so much to alienate the President from those who were his friends as this family of Blairs.

I have been drawn off into this personality. How could I help it? The Union organization by which I have stood since the first tocsin of arms was sounded at the attack on Sumter, I have followed it, never stopping to inquire whether a man who adhered to it was a Democrat or a Republican, and it was this organization and its policy that saved the country. I have met these men who call themselves Democrats everywhere. I know where they stand, and how they long for the flesh-pots of Egypt. But I have always found myself right when I have sustained the Union organization in my own State. Months ago I trembled for the President elected by Union votes, when I saw those men about the White House trying to steal him away, flattering him, eulogizing him, and dictating a policy for him.

When I saw, long since in the State Department, a pile of pardons as high as twenty family Bibles, [laughter,] and a man carrying a lot of them out, I saw it was a wholesale business, and was informed by a gentleman there he had carried out thousands of such.

Well may we tremble for the President, when we reflect how much depends on his fealty to his true friends.

But as my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has well said, the Union party will survive and save the country. I glory, sir, to-day, in the record of that party. There never has been a party in any country that has done so much for liberty. It has saved this Government from destruction. While the soldiers met the rebels in the field of battle and defeated them, the loyal men of the North met their allies in the political field, at the polls, and defeated them. I repeat, this Union party has saved the country in its hour of trial and it will triumph in the end, not so much on account of its numbers as because it is right. As my friend from Chicago [Mr. WENTWORTH] remarked the other day, "God will sustain us if we sustain the right."

I repeat, then, the Union party is bound to triumph. I may not indorse all that is done here by it. I am not quite satisfied with the report of the committee on reconstruction and shall vote to amend this proposition. But the Union party will live in spite of adversity. Already the political ax is falling upon the necks of our friends. Heads are falling in my own State.

A MEMBER. Who are they?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. As good men as ever lived are being displaced for bad men. The President has turned out the marshal of western Pennsylvania, as pure and upright a man and as capable as ever held office anywhere, and appointed a man in his place who was dismissed from service on a charge implicating his integrity. Thank God, he is not confirmed, and will not be. [Laughter.] I have met him very often. I do not know how much money he has made out of the position that he lost. The report varies.

Mr. SMITH. Who recommended him?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. It is not for me to say. Certainly the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] did not.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose somebody from Pennsylvania did it, and I would like to know.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. When I spoke to the President about the late marshal, and told him what I knew of him—told him that there was no more competent or worthy officer to be found—the President intimated that he should not be removed; but before two days elapsed he was removed and another name sent into the Senate; the one to whom I have referred as having been dismissed from the service of the Government charged with various crimes.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] if this person who was appointed marshal by the President did not carry with him some similar recommendations, in a political point of view, to those upon which the President released Clement C. Clay upon parole.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. Now, I venture to say—and I have not seen the record, and do not know whether there is any or not—that there is not an honest Union man in western Pennsylvania who signed any remonstrance against the late marshal. No charges were or could be preferred against so pure and upright a man, respected and loved by all who knew him. But there is a little cabal or clique of three or four men in Pittsburgh, in the district of my colleague, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] who cannot control twenty votes in any ward or borough in the State, brought this influence, with the aid of leading Democrats, to bear on the President; and I now make the prediction that notwithstanding that attempt to break down my colleague in his own district by removing some of his purest and best friends, he will come back here to the next Congress with as large a majority as he ever had before. Those few men, "sore-heads" we call them there, are men who always want offices for any party that has them to give. I hope the President will deem it proper and right to withdraw the name he proposed for marshal from the Senate. I am certain the President has been deceived in regard to that man, for he would not inflict such injustice on his loyal friends in western Pennsylvania—men who sustained him so cordially and so effectively.

I have always been treated kindly by the President personally, and always expect to be. When he makes a mistake he allows me to refer to it. And if I make a mistake I am willing that he should refer to it, if he does not do it in a speech on the 22d day of some month. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had not the slightest intention when I came here to-day of saying one word of what I have said. I have a speech here on the tariff, and on the subject of protection to wool. You told me that I could not get the floor next Saturday, but that I might get in a speech to-day, if I would hurry up and get it ready. So I went home yesterday, and being a hard-working man I sat up late last night and got up early this morning, and about concluded my preparations for a speech to-day on the tariff.

Now, I represent a district that is more interested in wool-growing than any other district in the country, not even excepting that represented by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] who has shown so much interest in wool this session. And I believe my own county has more and better sheep than any other county in the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I have been charged by the people in my district with having had so much to do with another kind of wool that was not so popular, that I thought I would go for another kind that the people are more willing to have.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Representing a district which has such a deep interest in the subject, I thought I would be justified in saying a few words in favor of protecting wool.

When this political subject came up I was led into speaking upon it, and I have said more than I had intended to do. I have this speech here on wool and tariff, but I feel some hesitation in boring the House with it, for it is a dry speech, full of statistics and figures.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the gentleman have leave to print his wool speech instead of the one he has made. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to that arrangement.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I do not know that the speech I have made now will appear very well in print. But I am sure the speech of my colleague to-day [Mr. RANDALL] will not compare very well with his former record.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] should not publish his speech of to-day we should lose Clymer's speech; and I should not want to lose that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the reporters of the Globe have already taken down his speech of to-day.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have been led off on this political question. But I want it distinctly understood that I intended only to get in this wool speech to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman have leave to print his wool speech.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly; that is right.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted. [The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have kept very quiet this session, as members very well know. I thought it most prudent in a new member not to mix up in these political discussions. But I felt it to be a duty that I owed to the people I represent to speak on this question of protection for wool. I have presented petitions with more than ten thousand names asking Congress to give them increased protection on wool. I have been, with others, before the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, and I will say to the country that we believe the committee have agreed to report just what the wool-growers desire on that subject.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will go on with this speech and let us have the other in print.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have little more to say, as my time is nearly out. I wish now to say, in addition to what I have said, that I am willing to trust the future of this great nation to the Union party which has done so much for the country. When a party is held together and actuated by an honest desire to perpetuate the greatest good for the greatest number, you cannot by these side issues and by executive patronage corrupt it and lead it away from the path of duty.

Sir, the people do not forget the amount of blood and treasure that they have spent during the last four or five years. They do not expect this Congress to proceed in the work of reconstruction upon a policy which would lose to the loyal people of the country all that they have gained in the late contest. And this Congress will be sustained as far as they are right.

The members of the Union party have been slandered and vilified and denounced all over the country; but, sir, I venture to say that this Congress comprises a body of men as honest and as faithful to the interests of the country as any men who ever sat in this Hall. Sir, we are assailed, not because we are partisans, but because we stand together as men loving justice, standing up for the right.

In the coming contest in Pennsylvania the Union party will be sustained. My colleague over the way [Mr. RANDALL] knows that the contest promises to be as bitter as any that we have ever had in that State. He knows how loyal the people of that Commonwealth are. He knows that Pennsylvania gave to the aid of the Government as many soldiers, and more, perhaps, in proportion to her population than any other State in the Union. He knows that the great heart of that giant State—it has sometimes been called the blind giant—has always beaten in unison with the highest and best interests of the country. And I tell him that on the night of the second Tuesday of October next we will send up from western Pennsylvania a voice which will convince him that the people have not forgotten the record of Heister Clymer. They have not forgotten the fact, which the legislative journals prove, that he uniformly voted against securing to the soldiers in the field the elective franchise; and in a public speech he boasted of having done so. In my presence he voted over and over again against every proposition calculated to assist and sustain the State and the nation in the late struggle. He has been a most consistent friend of Vallandigham and William B. Reed, and that class of men all over the country; and he is a fit representative to-day of the Democratic party. He is a friend of Woodward, who as judge of the supreme court made a decision against the constitutionality of the conscription law, and who, because of that decision and one against enfranchising the soldiers of the State, was nominated by the Democratic party for Governor.

Mr. Speaker, I say that when the people of Pennsylvania come to look at the record of the Democratic candidate for Governor in my State, not only on these questions relating to the war, but on other questions, they will repudiate him. The Union party in that State, as members of this House are aware, have nominated a candidate without reference to his political opinions; a man who did once act with the Democratic party. We expect to elect him, and we will elect him. I can assure you the people are honest and well-informed and will stand by the country, and the truest, best friends of the country, and all will be well. Now, I will not detain the House longer. Not a word on this question which I have said did I intend to say when I came into this House. I now yield the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend when I came here to-day to participate in this debate, nor did I expect when I came here to be entertained with debate of the character of that indulged in by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] Indeed, I should not now say anything did I not feel it was my duty, when a man holding a high official position in the United States, the highest within the gift of the people, is assailed in his personal, political, and national character, as a Representative of the people to sustain him in the principles which he has enunciated, and which I believe to be the true Union principles of the country. Nor do I, in the remarks I intend to make, expect to indulge in any loose charges against those who represent the Republican or so-called Union party. I am not ready to believe that the rank and file of that party are disloyal to their country, nor am I willing yet to believe that those eighteen hundred thousand men who supported George B. McClellan in 1864 were disloyal to the country and wished to accomplish its ruin and to establish a despotism in place of the free Government which descended to us from our forefathers.

But while I support the doctrine of the President of the United States with the rank and file of the Democratic party, it is from the fact that the doctrine he has enunciated now, and the doctrine he has always enunciated, is the doctrine of constitutional liberty, which is the very life and soul of our form of Government, without which the light of liberty would go out and we would sink into despotism. I take the ground here, and without fear of successful contradiction, that Andrew Johnson has not violated any principle he ever enunciated, that he acts to-day under the solemn obligations of the oath which he has taken to support the Constitution in all its integrity, that he has betrayed no principle or party, and that his only ambition and his only hope are to sustain this great and glorious Union in the pristine vigor which it had before the war commenced.

I am ashamed, sir, at the situation which affairs have taken in this country. I weep in silent sorrow that a Representative of the United States Congress should get the attention of this House and country in vilifying and abusing as true and noble a patriot as ever stood up in any country in defense of its imperiled existence; a man, sir, who left the Senate of the United States in response to the call of his country; a man who, although southern-born, still imbued with the teachings of the fathers of the Republic, stood with those lovers of his country whose blood has been so freely shed upon southern soil; a man who has been identified with the Unionists of the South from the commencement, and whose defense of our flag, emblematic of the principles of constitutional freedom, made him the envy and admiration of all civilized nations. Yes, sir, he left the Senate of the United States for the purpose of vindicating the founders of his country, and to stand by the principles embodied and set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I would not degrade this House so much as to descend to the position which has been taken here to-day by the honorable gentleman from Illinois in vilifying, abusing, traducing, and slandering as noble a patriot as ever lived upon the face of this earth.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman refers to the present President having left the Senate of the United States. When he left the Senate he did it to take possession of the office tendered to him by President Lincoln; that of military governor of the State of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he indorsed the act of President Lincoln in appointing a military Governor for Tennessee? If he did not, did he indorse the acceptance of that office on the part of Mr. Johnson?

Mr. ROGERS. I have no hesitation in saying that the appointment of military governors in time of war, when the civil tribunals could not perform their functions in the Union, was constitutional under the right to raise and support armies, repel invasions and suppress insurrections, and that when Abraham Lincoln appointed Andrew Johnson as military governor he did it as Commander-in-Chief under military law. And I am here to sustain the appointments of military governors under those circumstances, whether appointed by Abraham Lincoln or Andrew Johnson, as an element of military power when the nation is sought to be torn asunder by rebels in arms, as a necessary element of military power to sustain the flag and to defend the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from New Jersey evidently misapprehended my question. I asked him whether he, at the time Mr. Lincoln performed that act, indorsed it.

Mr. ROGERS. I say this: that I never had anything to say about it, that I know of, either publicly or privately, in any way whatever. But I never doubted the right of a military commander in a military district where hostilities existed and the flag of the country was being assailed by armed invasion, to use the military power within those military lines. And I say I have always indorsed, and do now indorse, the act of Abraham Lincoln in appointing military governors within the lines of the military operations.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman occupies a somewhat conspicuous position in the Democratic party, and inasmuch as he says that at that time he has no recollection of having uttered any word of indorsement or disapproval as an individual, I would ask him whether the party with which he then acted and now acts indorsed the acceptance of office by Andrew Johnson.

Mr. ROGERS. I say, sir, as a party, you can nowhere find in any State, county, or township an instance where the Democratic party ever denounced Abraham Lincoln for the exercise of military power within a State while the people of that State were arrayed in insurrection against the Government, and where civil law could not prevail.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I believe that the speech which was read at the desk a few moments ago, made by Mr. Clymer, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania, does distinctly denounce the action of Mr. Lincoln in making that appointment, and denounces the acceptance of it by Mr. Johnson. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether that utterance of Mr. Clymer at that time was not in harmony with the views and position of the Democratic party.

Mr. ROGERS. As to the utterance made by Heister Clymer I have no knowledge, and I am free to say that so far as my knowledge extended the party indorsed no such sentiments as are attributed to Mr. Clymer, but there is no proof that he ever uttered them except the assertion of an abolition sheet. And let me say further, that the Democratic party, with its eighteen hundred thousand voters in the North, and representing millions of women and children, is not to be bound down by the idle or loose declarations of any man, any more than the honorable gentleman would wish to have the whole Republican party bound down by the declaration of Wendell Phillips when he said that he had been a disunionist for thirty years, or of Horace Greeley when he held out an invitation to the southern people to secede.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I presume when that question was pending in the Senate of Pennsylvania that the Democratic party was represented in the persons of the Democratic Senators. Now, I ask whether that party thus represented did not sustain Heister Clymer by voting to refuse the use of the hall for the purpose of having that address made by Mr. Johnson.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; that was no indorsement of what Mr. Clymer said at all, any more than voting upon a proposition brought forward by a man is an indorsement of his speech made on that proposition. The Senators had a right to refuse the use of that Hall to anybody for a public meeting; and simply because those Senators who represented the Democratic party saw fit to cast their votes in accordance with the proposition of Mr. Clymer, it by no means follows as a fair conclusion that they indorsed all the language he is charged by that sheet to have used on that occasion.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to ask if Mr. Clymer has not been reelected to the Senate by the same people, and also renominated for Governor, since he made that utterance.

Mr. ROGERS. That may all be; but because he was reelected it is no evidence that the people who voted for him indorsed all he has said. I have no doubt that we have said many things on this floor and elsewhere that all our constituents do not indorse; and I will guaranty there is not a member here whose whole constituents will indorse all he has said. Will any one undertake to say, for instance, that all the Republicans of the district that sent to this body the gentleman who says he regards the States lately in rebellion as conquered provinces will indorse that utterance of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS?]

It is most unfair to undertake to make a great party responsible for what a few individuals may say. Because some men in the Democratic party may be unwise, that ought not to consign the Democratic party and its great doctrines to the tomb, even if the party should happen to support some of those men for official position.

I know there are members of the other side of the House, and I can pick them out, who often support measures advocated by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and yet disagree with him in the reasons by which he has reached his conclusions upon the subjects. I know from having had private conversations with them, and from hearing their speeches upon this floor, that this is the case. There are some of them who hold that the States are out of the Union, are dead for all political purposes; others hold that they are States in the Union, but without the right of representation. But there are some who hold with the Democratic party, that those States are entitled to immediate representation upon their representatives taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws, yet they all vote together when the test comes.

Now, to charge a whole party with the responsibility of the acts of Mr. Vallandigham, or anybody else, is uncharitable and unjust to the eighteen hundred thousand men in the North, many of whom had periled their lives in defense of their country, who voted for George B. McClellan for President of the United States. I say without fear of contradiction that the records of the Democratic party, from a period coeval with the formation of our Government, show that their doctrines and principles brought us to a state of prosperity unequalled in the annals of history. And only when the last generations of mankind have been gathered to the silent tomb will the principles they have always maintained and advocated cease to exist. And I am not to be driven from my honest convictions of duty by any denunciations of the party to which I belong, or by calling them traitors and disunionists.

Sir, Andrew Johnson is pursuing now just exactly the course he has always advocated. You cannot find in the Baltimore platform, upon which Abraham Lincoln was nominated and elected as President and Andrew Johnson as Vice President of the United States, one single word which contradicts what he now seeks to carry out. Will you call Andrew Johnson a traitor and disunionist because he wants the union of the whole country? What was the object of the bloody war from which we have just emerged? Why were a million men killed, maimed, and wounded upon the field of battle, and $3,000,000,000 of Federal and $1,500,000,000 of State debt imposed upon the country? Why have weeping and sorrow and anguish been carried to almost every home in this broad land? It was because we desired to perpetuate the Union which our forefathers established and handed down to us for the protection and defense of the white men and the white women of this land.

Sir, Andrew Johnson wants the Union as it was. He wants the Union that was made by the fathers and sages of the times that tried men's souls. He wants the Union which was intended to be the shield of the rights of the States, and the protector and guardian of the rights of the Federal Government. He wants the proper equilibrium preserved between the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government. And because he will not violate every pledge of faith that the Republican party made to the people in 1864, he is to be branded here as a tyrant and usurper, and as a violator of the principles which lay at the foundation of our Government.

I do not want to insult any one. I do not rise for any such purpose. But when any of you rise here and charge, as you have to-day, the Democratic party and Andrew Johnson with being traitors to their country and sympathizers with secession, I denounce it as wickedly false. This Congress, by its acts, through this central directory of fifteen that holds its secret sessions in this Capitol, is sapping the very life-blood and weakening the very foundations of this Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he is not himself a member of that central directory of which he speaks.

Mr. ROGERS. I am, and I have great respect for the men who are on it. I am not here to say that those men, or any men upon the other side of the House, are actuated by any desire to commit intentional wrong. I would not degrade myself and the country by charging that gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have always treated me with respect, are any of them desirous to injure the country. But their prejudices and their passions, as in the case of John Brown when he committed murder and treason in Virginia, are leading the country on to destruction, and without the interposition of Andrew Johnson the lamp of liberty would soon be extinguished forever.

Now, sir, I had no participation in the election of Andrew Johnson—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman another question. It may be that this "directory" has been guilty of something which has not been disclosed. If the gentleman is at liberty to name it I should like him to do so. I believe that the committee has removed the injunction of secrecy.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman knows perfectly well what has been done by that committee. He knows that from that committee have emanated projects of disunion. He knows that from that committee has emanated the doctrine embodied in the proposed constitutional amendment and the two bills which have been presented—the doctrine that the war dissolved the Union, that the southern States are out of the Union, and that it will require an enabling act of Congress and an amendment of the Constitution to bring those States back into the Union.

I am no disunionist. I will cooperate with no party that seeks to destroy this country. When the leaders of the majority party on the floor charge me and my fellow-members of this Democratic party with being traitors, I hurl back the charge into their teeth, and tell them that they are the only party now preventing the consummation of the great work of restoring the Union upon the principles of self-government consecrated by the blood of our revolutionary forefathers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The committee of which the gentleman is a member have presented their report proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. One provision of that proposed amendment is, as I understand, that the southern States shall no longer be entitled to that unfair and unjust share of representation which they have heretofore enjoyed, and that, instead of having as the result of four years of war, an increase of political power in consequence of the emancipation of the slaves, they shall conform to a basis of representation which will be just to both the North and the South, applying to all the States alike, and under which those who are enfranchised shall be represented. Now, I desire to know whether the gentleman is opposed to that principle embodied in the report of that committee, or "directory," as he terms it.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir, I am opposed to it for the same reasons that our fathers were opposed to taxation by the British Parliament when they were denied representation in that body. I am opposed to it on the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the fundamental doctrines of the Constitution.

Sir, let me say further, in answer to that suggestion, that at the time of the formation of the Constitution slaves were held in all the States except one, and there was in many of the States a large colored population. From time to time slavery was abolished in the different northern States; yet, although the abolition was not accompanied by the enfranchisement of those who were emancipated, no one proposed that any of these States should be deprived of representation for the colored population to whom they denied the right of suffrage.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We are not proposing, as I understand, even if we adopt the amendment reported by the committee, to take away from any State any just share of representation. The proposition, as I understand it, is this, and no more: that a man in South Carolina shall have no more political power in this nation than a man in New Jersey or in Iowa; that a white man in the State of South Carolina, which inaugurated this rebellion, shall not have as much power as that exercised by three men in the State of Iowa. I ask the gentleman whether he is opposed to that kind of representation.

Mr. ROGERS. I maintain, sir, that there is no more necessity for an amendment of the Constitution, because a portion of the southern population, lately slaves, have become free, than there was for a constitutional amendment when the various northern States abolished slavery within their limits. I say that the Constitution as it stands grants to the southern people no right of representation except that based on population; and in this respect all the States are placed on an equality; the South enjoys no peculiar advantage. Sir, if a million foreigners land at the port of New York and become a part of the population of the State of New York, that State, under the Constitution, is entitled to representation for those foreigners, although they may never become citizens and never vote.

And I say, sir, that the representation which has been allowed to the people of the southern States for the people of color will not exceed the basis for representation of foreigners who are not entitled to vote in the northern, middle, and western States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Would not the same result follow if one hundred thousand foreigners or a million foreigners should go into South Carolina instead of into New York?

Mr. ROGERS. Exactly. Let us leave the landmarks of this Government as they were when the Government was made. I believe this Government is the fruit of the most experienced wisdom of any people who ever lived, and that Washington and Jefferson and the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, coming out of the Revolution imbued with the principles of liberty and having the mantle of victory and patriotism thrown over them, were the best judges of what the true interests of this country are. Sir, in this time of excitement and of peril, when the Union, by the action of the members of this Congress, is dissolved, because eleven States are prevented from sending their Representatives here, to which right, under the Constitution, they are entitled, it is no time to amend the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman speaks of the excellence and perfection of the Constitution as our fathers made it. I ask him whether he does not think the Constitution now, embodying as it does the prohibition of slavery throughout the country, is not a little better than it was before.

Mr. ROGERS. That is an issue which I am not here now to discuss. It is an issue dead and gone. It is part of the history of the past. It has become part of the Constitution of the United States and freedom has been proclaimed to four million people. My vote, power, and influence shall be given to sustain that provision so long as I may live, whether North or South shall desire to strike it out.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask whether if those States who have been in rebellion were represented in these Halls at that time that provision would not have been defeated.

Mr. ROGERS. At that time these men were engaged in rebellion and were convicts before the altar of patriotism. The execution of the law has been forgiven by the clemency and Christian character of the President. While they were firing upon the flag of the country and trying to destroy this Government they were not entitled to any consideration at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman whether he approves that portion of the President's conduct and policy which compelled the people of these unrepresented States to ratify that amendment and make it a part of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not then approve of it, but I believe now it was for the best interests of the country; that as an issue of war it should be given up in the reconstruction, after the war had wiped out slavery, to prevent future agitation upon it. I am satisfied that the best interests, the grandeur, glory, and perpetuity of this Government demanded that the States should perpetuate the result of the war in striking the shackles of slavery from every human being within the length and breadth of this land. I never was in favor of slavery. No man, sir, ever heard me advocate slavery in the abstract, but I was in favor of standing by the elementary principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States. I believed, and do yet believe, that abolishing slavery by war was in violation of the plighted faith of Congress as given in the Crittenden resolutions adopted after the war had begun, and of the letter, spirit, and intent of the Constitution. That proposition set forth the principles upon which this war was fought, and it emphatically declared that when the rebels laid down their arms the Union should be restored.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman has to some extent eulogized the abolition amendment, and also the conduct of the President of the United States in relation to it, the Congress that passed it, and the Legislatures in the insurgent States which ratified it.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not eulogized them at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, that great good could have been provided, whether that amendment of the Constitution could have been had, whether that security of liberty could have been procured for the people of this country if the insurgent States had been represented in these Halls; and if not, whether it would have been wise to postpone until their recognition was procured action on that amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; I am not finding any fault, and if the gentleman had listened to me he would have seen that I found none with the course of action at that time in taking advantage of the absence of southern Representatives. But I held then as I do now, with Alexander Stephens, that there is no power in the Federal Government to usurp the functions of a State that have never been delegated to the Federal Government, even by a constitutional amendment made without the authority of the other States. I say that the abolition of slavery was an event of the war, and the result of one of the principles of war resorted to by the conquering power, that being the arbitrament to which the southern people submitted. And slavery having been abolished under those circumstances, I wish to keep it dead and buried forever, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman says he is opposed to the exercise of powers not delegated by the Constitution. I desire him to point out the particular clause which authorized the President to appoint provisional governors for those States and to require of those States the ratification of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. ROGERS. The power was this: the Constitution of the United States says that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, and when the people of any State are in insurrection, or when a State is overrun by the armies of other States, it is the duty of the President to call out the militia, suppress the insurrection, and repel that invasion. And it was by virtue of the power conferred by the force of military law, as embodied in the Constitution of the United States, that Abraham Lincoln had a right, not as President of the United States, but as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to dictate such a state of affairs as would come within the requirement of the Constitution in guarantying to those States a republican form of government. And as slavery was an instrument of war, one of the principles upon which it was waged, the main principle, in fact, for the last two years, the arbitrament has settled that as much as any other question. When the people went to war these extraneous matters gave way to the force of the arbitrament, and were settled for all time to come.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I desire to ask, inasmuch as Texas was omitted from the proclamation of the President, whether, in the gentleman's opinion, if Congress should pass the amendment now pending, it would be competent for Andrew Johnson, as President of the United States, to require of Texas the ratification of that amendment before he would recognize her as restored to such an extent as to be entitled to representation in Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir. I claim, notwithstanding what Andrew Johnson may have required, that when the rebels laid down their arms and submitted to the Constitution of the United States the war was ended. Notwithstanding anything that may have been put on paper by the President or anybody else, the very moment the southern States succumbed that very moment their State governments could by the people be put in full operation, because those State governments had been merely suspended by virtue of the illegality of action of the southern people, which never could destroy the existence of those States as States of the Union under the original act of admission.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If I understand the gentleman's position, it is, that while the war was going on, before the rebel armies surrendered, the President might do this thing. But I wish to ask him whether the rebels had not surrendered before the President issued his first proclamation for the establishment of a provisional government in North Carolina, and whether all those provisional governments were not established after the surrender, and all those requirements on the part of the President were not subsequent to that time, by which they were to do certain things, and among others ratify the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. ROGERS. Nobody can doubt that a State government may be operated within the military lines by military governors, and it was only as a condition to the laying down of their arms that the Commander-in-Chief exercised the right under the Constitution to establish a republican form of government and lent the aid of the military power to the people of the insurgent States for them to ratify the act in such manner as they thought right, and upon such principles of the union of the several States as existed before they attempted to carry them out of the Union.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey to say that as soon as the rebel armies surrendered, the old State governments as they existed prior to the rebellion at once revived; of course that must have included the revival of the constitutions of those States. Now, I wish the gentleman to state whether those States had republican forms of government before the rebellion. If so, and those governments were revived by the surrender of the rebel armies, where did the President get the power to require them to change those republican forms of government?

Mr. ROGERS. He was authorized to exercise that power upon the ground that the acts which had been performed in behalf of the confederacy were acts which were void ab initio; and there is no better settled principle of law than that no void or illegal act can overturn or destroy that which was legal, and therefore every movement of the southern people with reference to furthering or carrying into effect the machinery of the confederate government was without authority of law, and was in violation of the government, which the President of the United States was bound to uphold by all the means in his power. And he was authorized to put down all the forms of State government which the people of the South had adopted to sustain the cause of the confederacy. When those forms had been put down, then the status of those States, as it existed before the rebellion commenced, returned to them, except so far as regards what was declared to be the corner-stone of the rebellion, which was put in issue, and which went down with the rebellion under the military power of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not see that the gentleman from New Jersey has answered one question which I put to him. That question was, whether the insurgent States, prior to the rebellion, had republican forms of government.

Mr. ROGERS. I say they had.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman said that the surrender of the rebel armies revived the State governments that were in force before the rebellion.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Consequently each one of those States, upon the surrender of the rebel armies, had a republican form of government, which had been revived.

Mr. ROGERS. Exactly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman where the President gets the power to require those States to change the republican forms of government which they already had.

Mr. ROGERS. I say he did not require them to change their republican forms of government. Neither slavery nor the rebel debt was any part of their State government; no act of the southern people in aid of the confederacy was a part of their republican form of government. Therefore, I say that republican forms of government did exist and were not affected by the action of the President. The President is not to be called a usurper of power because he did not allow the people of the South to continue that which they had established in aid of the confederacy. All that he did, and all that he wanted to do, was to resuscitate their republican forms of government and to give full vigor to the voice of the people under them.

Mr. GRINNELL. Why does not the gentleman answer the question of my colleague, [Mr. WILSON?]

Mr. ROGERS. I do answer it. I say that Andrew Johnson has not acted in conflict with the Constitution. And I say he is not in the hands of the Democratic party. He never has appointed a Democrat to office; all his patronage is given to the party that elected him. And he is going to fight this battle out in the lines of the so-called Union party. And I tell you that eighteen hundred thousand Democrats will follow him or any other man who holds out to them the unfolded leaves of the Constitution and enunciates the doctrines and principles upon which the liberties of our country are founded.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman from New Jersey to say that he never was in favor of slavery; that he was always opposed to it. If the gentleman is sincere in that declaration, and I have no doubt he is, then I would ask him why he opposed the amendment to the Constitution by means of which we were enabled to get rid of slavery in a constitutional way.

Mr. ROGERS. Because I took the ground here, as the Speaker well knows, both that winter and the winter before, that there was nothing in the Constitution which gave us power over the subject; that it was a reserved right of the States, not delegated to the United States, to control their domestic institutions exclusively in accordance with their own judgment. Another reason for my course then was that the rebellion was not ended, and I believed it would tend to alienate the affections of the people of the South and lead them to continue longer in war against the Union; not that I had any doubt that the Union armies would finally succeed.

Now, sir, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] expresses a wish that Andrew Johnson had been swallowed in the Red sea of destruction, like Pharaoh and his hosts, it is a wish which, it appears to me, an American Representative should blush to utter. Sir, does a noble, patriotic President deserve to be spoken of in this manner simply because he is exercising his constitutional power to vindicate the great doctrines of civil liberty upon which the welfare and the progress of this country depend?

Sir, gentlemen are mistaken when they imagine that the American people can ever be brought to sympathize with the revolutionary doctrines of the disunionists which they have advocated in this Congress, doctrines which proclaim the dismemberment of the country and declare in effect that the country's flag, with its brilliant galaxy of stars, representing in undiminished number our grand sisterhood of States, is a "haunting lie." Sir, the people of this nation, who have fought to maintain the integrity of our Union and the perpetuity of the Constitution, recognize in the policy of Andrew Johnson the great principles for which they have been battling; and they will never consent that those principles shall be trampled under foot by disunionists of either the South or the North.

Sir, I believe that the principles which Andrew Johnson is so nobly defending will be successfully vindicated, and that, notwithstanding the denunciation and the calumny to which he is at this hour subjected, his memory will be honorably handed down to future generations, and posterity will thank him for planting the policy of the Government firmly upon those principles which are destined to conduct this nation to a grand and illustrious destiny; and like Washington, his name will be recorded in history as the deliverer of thirty million people from threatened bondage and despotism, whose record will be read by generations unborn as a bright monument of civil liberty, to whose name the great and the good, so long as free Governments exist, will do honor. His tomb will be visited and his remains in death revered as a solemn duty of a grateful people. May God give him a strength, wisdom, power, and influence to work out his great mission, and save him from the hand of the assassin, that he may be spared to see the Union of our fathers, the grandest and most united of any in the world, marching on in defense of the Constitution as the brightest jewel vouchsafed to man, until the dying gaze of his last look upon earth shall be brightened by the burning flame of the Union's cause, with fanaticism, radicalism, and disunionism dead and gone.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of B. E. Harrison, of Lagrange, Prince William county, Virginia, asking that United States taxes paid by him may be refunded. By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of 71 citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, for an increase of duty on foreign wools.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 7, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting the annual Report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, with the following resolution, submitted by Mr. TRUMBULL:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the Report of the Smithsonian Institution be printed; two thousand for the Institution, and three thousand for the use of the Senate; and that the said report be stereotyped.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Benjamin Franklin, late a private in company H, second Minnesota cavalry, who lost both hands and both feet while absent from his regiment on a furlough, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Fox river, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of two hundred and sixty-four glass-blowers, and others, employed in the glass manufacturing business in the third congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying for an increased tariff on imported glassware to protect their labor and prevent the serious injury to and suspension of their business threatened by the large orders for foreign glassware being filled under the present insufficient tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of Louisa Baird, praying for compensation for her interest in the steamboat Sovereign, which she alleges was seized and sold at Cairo, Illinois, under a decree of confiscation of the United States district court for that district; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of N. S. Davis, and nineteen other medical gentlemen, representing themselves to be a committee appointed by the American Medical Association, recently in session in Baltimore, praying that the medical and surgical history of the late war, prepared in the office of the Surgeon General of the United States Army, as a work of great use to the public and to the medical profession, be printed by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Brevel Brigadier General S. D. Sturgis and other officers of the United States Army stationed in Texas, stating that they understand the act authorizing an increase in the commutation of officers' rations expired on the 1st of May, 1866, and praying for its renewal; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That Miles Devine have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That John Egenolf have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate a certain bond which accompanied his claim upon which an adverse report was made and to which report the Senate agreed, on the 4th instant.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Allen, late colonel of the first and one hundred and forty-fifth regiments of New York volunteers, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred by him in raising those regiments and for compensation for services while in command of the latter regiment, reported that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 307) authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 309) to authorize Samuel Stevens, a Stockbridge Indian, to enter and purchase a certain tract of land in the Stockbridge reserve in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLAIMS ON NEVADA.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 84) authorizing the payment of certain claims against the late Territory of Nevada; which was read a first time by its title, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the reading of the resolution at length and for its present consideration. I will state that in the settlement of the accounts of the Territory of Nevada there was a surplus in the legislative fund and a small deficiency in the fund for the payment of the expenses of the executive department of the Territory. This resolution was drawn up in the Treasury Department, and simply provides for the transfer of a sufficient amount of the surplus in the legislative fund to settle the accounts for the executive department. I presume it will be unnecessary to refer the resolution to any committee.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay outstanding claims chargeable to the contingent expenses of the executive department of the Territory of Nevada it proposes to transfer so much of the unexpended balance of appropriation for compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, &c., of the Territory of Nevada as may be found necessary for that purpose to the credit of the fund for paying the contingent expenses of the executive department of the Territory; and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are directed out of the balance thus transferred to pay the claims as adjusted and allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks for the present consideration of this joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better go over, so that we may see it in print.

Mr. STEWART. As there seems to be some objection to it, I ask that it lie on the table, and I will call it up in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution lies over under the rule.

Subsequently, on the motion of Mr. STEWART, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) explanatory of, and in addition to, the act of May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in Wisconsin;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I desire for a single instant to call the attention of my honorable friend who is at the head of that committee [Mr. POMEROY] to it. It does not ask for any additional grant of land whatever. It asks simply that Congress shall assume to the disposition which the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin have made of the grants—a disposition which was made, I think, unanimously by the Legislature. It takes no more land, but it is a changing of the route in order to avoid the difficulties, if I may so express myself, which Congress imposed upon the Legislature of Wisconsin when they gave them different starting places in the State at which to begin, arriving at a single point on Lake Superior. The difficulties growing out of the struggle between those local places led to some considerable discussion in the Legislature, and finally, as I understand it, they agreed upon this resolution unanimously. It asks no additional land, but it asks a change of the route so as to conform to the local interests of these places. I hope my honorable friend from Kansas, in taking up the resolution in his committee, will let us hear from it at an early day.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands will be glad to hear the Senator from Wisconsin at any meeting of the committee. We meet on Thursday, and I hope the Senator will come and see us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE subsequently said: At the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, I ask that the joint resolution introduced by me in relation to the land grants to Wisconsin, and which was referred to that committee, be ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered if there be no objection.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate three thousand copies of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the opinions of the several judges, on the taxation of national banks by State authority.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is unusual for the Senate to print decisions of the Supreme Court; but there are a multitude of cases pending, growing out of the taxation of United States securities, by or under State authority, and I have had a great number of applications for this decision, in order to govern the action in other cases.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not published by the reporter?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is published by the reporter; but the fund is limited, and the number published by him is exhausted. I have here what he tells me is the last copy. I should like to have this resolution adopted, so that we may have it in this form.

The resolution was adopted.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 3d instant, the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) expressive of the gratitude of the nation to the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

And also that the President had approved and signed, on the 5th instant, the following acts:

An act (S. No. 26) to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and the other West India islands, and the Bahamas; and

An act (S. No. 155) concerning the boundaries of the State of Nevada.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. A few days ago I reported from the Committee on Printing a resolution to reduce the number of copies of the mechanical Patent Office Report, which was laid over at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK], and if he has no objection I should like to have the resolution disposed of now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the number of copies heretofore ordered of the Reports of the Patent Office for the years 1863 and 1864 be reduced from ten thousand of each to four thousand of each.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the resolution of the Senate instructing the standing Committees of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds to make inquiry concerning the further accommodation of the State Department.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of general in the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 352) to incorporate the National Theological Institute;

A bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 482) to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home, of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 510) to incorporate the Academy of Music of Washington city.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. NESMITH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 101.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, the pending question being on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as amended, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That in every case in which a commissioned officer actually entered on duty as such commissioned officer, but by reason of being killed in battle, capture by the enemy, or other cause beyond his control, and without fault or neglect of his own, was not mustered within a period of not less than thirty days from acceptance of appointment or actual entry upon duty, and who was afterward regularly mustered into the service of the United States, the pay department shall allow to such officer full pay and emoluments from the date on which such officer actually entered on such duty as aforesaid, deducting from the amount paid, in accordance with this resolution, all pay actually received by such officer for such period.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have this joint resolution lie over, for the purpose of having a report made in regard to some questions I asked at the War Department connected with it. I hope the Senator from Oregon will let it lie over to-day, and I shall endeavor to be ready to-morrow.

Mr. NESMITH. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER ARMY REGISTER.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) respecting the publication of the Volunteer Army Register was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of War to cause to be canceled the volumes of the Roster of volunteers already printed, and to provide that the Roster compiled as directed by the joint resolution approved March 2, 1865, be published in accordance with a plan submitted by the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Mr. WILSON. The object of this joint resolution is to have a correct publication, and to have it at a greatly reduced cost. A joint resolution was passed the object of which was to have a correct roll of the officers of volunteers. The first volume has been published, covering the New England States. I have examined it with care, and I do not believe there is a single page of it without an error; whole regiments are left out; names of officers are left out, and others misspelled, and misstatements made as regard to them. As a publication it is utterly worthless, and worse than worthless.

This proposition is to cancel that publication, and to adopt a plan that will, instead of having eight volumes, get it into three or four, less than half the space now occupied, and to have it correct. There is no difficulty in having a correct Register. It simply requires intelligence and careful examination; and unless it be correct it is of no account. This proposition is to cancel the volume already published, and to commence anew on a plan prepared by the Superintendent of Public Printing; and I think that if this be adopted, it can be done at less than half the expense now about to be incurred. It is a proposition to get a correct list at less than half the expense for which we are to have this incorrect one, and therefore I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree in the remarks that the Senator from Massachusetts has made; but I should like to inquire of him if the resolution provides for another defect which I noticed in that Register. In regard to a large number of the regiments, I should think half of them, there was this note, "The engagements in which this regiment has borne an honorable part have not been made known in general orders," although some of the regiments were disbanded two or three years ago. I do not see why it is necessary that the battles in which the regiments have borne part should be promulgated in general orders before they can be put upon the roster; but if it be necessary, I should like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when we may expect those orders to be issued. Some of those regiments have been out of service for three or four years and some of them were in a good many battles.

Mr. WILSON. Scarcely any of them have been promulgated.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does this resolution provide for that?

Mr. WILSON. I think it does not, but the object is to have it published on a correct plan.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would it not be better to put in an amendment that the battles in which they have been engaged should be placed on the roster?

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what is the necessity for publishing these large and cumbersome volumes. I suppose there is not a State in the Union that has not thorough reports already made embracing the name of every person who has enlisted into the Army from that State during the war, and what became of him, whether he was promoted or not, and whether he came out of the service safe or not. I know that to be the case with my State, and I am thoroughly satisfied that no volume can be compiled here at the capital that will be half as accurate or satisfactory in regard to my State as the adjutant general's report of that State. I suppose other States are doing the same thing. If this be so, where is the necessity of duplicating these reports? I suppose these volumes will cost one or two hundred thousand dollars before we are done with them.

Mr. WILSON. Two hundred and forty thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand dollars on the original plan.

Mr. GRIMES. I apprehend the Senator's own State has an adjutant general's report.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; and I consider it very perfect.

Mr. GRIMES. We have one in my State which is very accurate, and I presume every State has or will have; hence where is the necessity for duplication?

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that in 1864 a joint resolution was passed providing for the publication of a full Army Volunteer Register to be in connection with the regular Army Register. This was not complied with, however; and on the 2d of March, 1865, another joint resolution was passed "to provide for the publication of a full Army Register." It provided—

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be printed and published a full roster or roll of all general, field, line, and staff officers of volunteers who have been in the Army of the United States at any time since the beginning of the present rebellion, including all informal organizations which have been reorganized or accepted and paid by the United States, showing whether they are yet in service, or have been discharged therefrom, and giving casualties and other explanations proper for such register. And to defray in whole or in part the expenses of this publication, an edition of twenty-five thousand copies of such enlarged Register shall be published and may be sold to officers, soldiers, or citizens, at a price which shall not more than cover the actual cost of paper, printing, and binding, and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume."

Under this resolution the first volume has been prepared, which includes the New England States. I have examined it, and find that several of the regiments are left out altogether, and in regard to other regiments there are many errors. I examined the list of three Massachusetts regiments and found several mistakes in each, and I have no doubt that there is hardly a page in the volume which can be relied upon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much has that volume cost?

Mr. ANTHONY. A dollar a volume for each copy; it will take four volumes.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that it will take eight dollars. We sell it for a dollar a volume, but it will cost more than that. The volume cannot be got up for anything like a dollar.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the gross amount of expenditure?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know precisely what it is. I understand that it costs more to correct the stereotyped plates than it did to make them originally. If anything is to be done in this matter, the Register should be made correct by examining, not only the records in the offices here, but those in the offices of the respective States, so that a correct list may be published, in order that we may have the names of all the officers who have served in the volunteer forces of the United States during the war in one publication with everything in regard to their services, showing whether they were dismissed or discharged or honorably mustered out, or whether they were killed or wounded. By having these facts all in one publication, they can be ascertained for the whole country in any part of the country. It seems to me that the object, which was what I have just stated, was an excellent one; and if it should be correctly carried out, and at a reasonable expense, the publication would be of great value to the country. Then in Massachusetts we should be able to learn all these facts with regard to the officers of any State, Iowa included, and the same would be the case in every part of the country.

It was provided that a certain number of copies might be sold at one dollar a volume, which would defray a part of the expense. A plan has been adopted at the War Department contrary to the plan recommended by Mr. Defrees. His plan, I think, would bring the whole publication within three or four volumes; theirs will be at least eight, and will involve an expense of more than two hundred thousand dollars. The expense of his plan, of course, if he brings the work within three volumes, will be but little more than one third of the cost of the present plan.

What I wish to do is to cancel what has been done, for it is utterly worthless, and to begin again upon the plan prepared by Mr. Defrees, which is an economical plan, one under which a page will contain as much as two or three pages under the present plan, and then to go on and complete the work. The work ought to be perfect and complete, or else it is worthless. The object of this joint resolution is in the first place to get a correct Register, and in the next place to get it at about one third of the expense which this incorrect one will cost us. It is worse than nothing, because an official publication that is not correct is of no account to the country; it misleads men rather than gives information.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurs to me that a correct list had better be taken from the offices of the adjutant generals of the various States, and not try to get it here.

Mr. WILSON. I think that if the Senator from Kansas had this work to get out he would consult the officer here and consult the adjutant general's office of each State also, and compare the records, and then he would have a correct list. I should be very sorry if with the means at our command any men of intelligence could not make a perfect list. There is no difficulty about it; it only requires labor, thought, care.

Mr. POMEROY. I supposed each State had a perfect list. I know that my State has been at great expense and has spared no pains in getting a most perfect list for the State and I supposed all the States had done the same. It occurred to me that if the resolution was to be passed the list when made out ought to be made up from the returns in the adjutant general's office of each State rather than by examining the rolls here. That would save a great part of the labor of getting it up at any rate.

Mr. GRIMES. I am satisfied that such a report as the Senator from Massachusetts desires to have published by the authority of Congress, published in an intelligible form and in type which gentlemen who have reached that period of life which he and I are now entering upon can read, will embrace not less than twenty-five volumes. I am speaking of that whereof I know something. The State of Iowa furnished about seventy-five thousand troops, and the last I know of the report in that State on this subject, which was printed in a reasonable sized type, it embraced two volumes quite as large as this, [exhibiting an octavo volume,] and I think there is another one about to be published.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That included, however, a list of the privates as well as the officers.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have one of those reports which contains the name of every man in our State that went into the service, officer or private.

Mr. GRIMES. That is, I suppose, what we are going to publish here. Why do we want to publish the name of a second lieutenant and not publish the name of an orderly sergeant?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. This provides for the officers only.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the purpose of this thing? It is to give some data to govern our officers in the future. If it is to result in anything of real advantage to the Government it must be something tangible that can be relied upon in the future as to not only the number of men that went into the service, but the identity of the men in question, growing out of pensions, &c. I would not give a straw for a mere roster of the officers. That indicates nothing. It was not the officers that fought our battles and won our victories for us. I would like to see the gradations by which these men went up from privates to become officers, which is exhibited by the adjutant general's report of my State, showing that a very large proportion of the men who went into the Army as officers ceased very soon to be such, and that the men who went in the humblest and lowest positions very soon became the commanders, not only of their companies, but of their regiments and of their brigades. Such a report as that may be of value, although if you publish such a one as that, it seems to me it is only cumulative of expense when the States have already done it. We have got a report in my State that embraces officers, privates, musicians, everybody connected with the service, showing when he entered the service, when he went out, what offices he filled during the time he was in service, what has become of him since, where he was born, and in what place he enlisted. Such a report as that is of value. This report will be utterly worthless to the public. I hope the Senator will allow this joint resolution to be recommitted to his committee, and that they will report a bill repealing the law which authorized this printing to be done.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that I have seen the report of the adjutant general's office of his State, and it is a most admirable one. I wish they had such a one in every State, and I wish we had one that recorded equally the name of every soldier that served the Republic; but that would make a great many volumes. The report of Iowa makes three large octavo volumes for seventy thousand men. Now, sir, here is a list of officers from the New England States making three hundred pages, and if it was put upon a good plan it could be got into about one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five pages. It will be seen that there is a great part of it waste paper, and the report is imperfect in itself. What the committee desired in this matter was to stop this imperfect report and this enormous expense. If the Senate desire to stop the publication altogether they can do so; but I think we had better publish the work. We can publish it in three good, fair-sized volumes, and have a perfect list of all the officers, and the casualties, and all the incidents connected with the war. We cannot afford to sell it for one dollar a volume as is proposed here; but we could furnish three volumes containing a list of all the officers of the volunteer forces of the United States, to be placed in every library of the country, and it would certainly, in my judgment, be a work of great value. If we could have a list of the two million seven hundred thousand soldiers who have gone into the service I should be glad to have it, but that would require the publication of fifty or sixty volumes; at enormous expense, and would necessarily take a great deal of time. This report will take time, and ought to take time. We need not hurry about it. What we want is to have a correct list. Mr. Defrees made a plan by which this report of three hundred pages, if his plan had been agreed upon, would have been reduced down to one hundred and twenty-five pages, and the arrangement was far better and more intelligible than the present one. As it is now it is worthless, and I hope that no more expenditures will be incurred in publishing this volume. I believe we had better adopt this resolution, and let the work go on at a reduced rate, but if Senators are not ready to act upon it now I will let it go over.

Mr. GRIMES. Recommit it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have it recommitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this matter is to go over I should like to call up the motion to reconsider the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. I move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, and we will reconsider it; and I ask that in the mean time the report in this case be examined by the Senate. They will see that this work ought certainly not to go on.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to another defect in this report, which I think this resolution does not provide against. There is nothing in this resolution that prevents the new roster from being edited precisely as this is. There should be some provision for a competent editorial supervision of it; and there should also be a provision for a record of all the battles in which regiments have borne an honorable part, whether promulgated in general orders or not. But if we merely pass this resolution as it stands, I do not see that there is any provision in it for correcting editorial errors. There ought to be some competent officer detailed, and it should be made his entire business to correspond with the adjutant generals of the several States and have all the records of each State submitted to the State authorities.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, as he and I are on the Military Committee, that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing understand this matter better than we do, and they now have the ideas of the Senator from Massachusetts on the subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. This resolution has never been before the Committee on Printing; the Committee on Military Affairs have had charge of it, and I think they had better keep charge of it. It is rather an extravagant thing, and the Committee on Printing never reported anything extravagant, and we do not want to be responsible for it.

Mr. WILSON. I move that this joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. I think we shall get it into a satisfactory shape.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 86) to provide for the publication of the official history of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of general in the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 352) to incorporate the National Theological Institute—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 482) to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home, of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 510) to incorporate the Academy of Music of Washington city—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 563) to regulate the time and fix the place for holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Virginia, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 137) to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax or duty, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the benefit of Colonel R. E. Bryant;

A bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863;

A bill (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke;

A bill (H. R. No. 473) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill No. 109, relating to the Sioux City branch of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while to take that bill up. At one o'clock there is a special order, and it is now one minute to one o'clock.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the special order?

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to reconsider the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, and it ought to be disposed of. I do not think it will take long to dispose of it.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the unfinished business and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill. The unfinished business, I believe, is the railroad bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. POLAND to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted the following amendment offered by Mr. TRUMBULL:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate, and since its last adjournment, by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office; the cause, in case of removal, to be reported to the Senate at its next session.

Mr. POLAND. I voted for the amendment to this bill, and for the bill itself, with great hesitation, and with the design, if I could not become better satisfied with it, to move to have it reconsidered. Subsequent reflection satisfied me that the amendment ought not to be adopted, and I therefore made the motion to reconsider.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to this bill is very general and comprehensive in its terms, and denies any payment of salary or compensation to officers appointed by the President before confirmation by the Senate, unless appointed to fill vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for official misconduct.

It is said that one of the mischiefs which this amendment is designed to prevent is the filling of vacancies which exist while the Senate is in session, and where there is an opportunity to submit nominations for their advice and consent, and this is omitted, or the nomination is rejected by the Senate, and the same person reappointed after the Senate adjourns. If the amendment went no further than this I could very cheerfully support it, for the language of the Constitution is clear that the President's power of appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate is confined to vacancies that happen during the recess of the Senate.

But the amendment has a scope and meaning far beyond this. The power of the President to fill all vacancies that happen during the recess of the Senate is not denied. But this amendment declares that unless the vacancies happen in a particular way, the person appointed shall receive no salary or compensation until confirmed by the Senate.

I have not examined or considered whether the exceptions cover every possible occasion of vacancy which can occur, except removals for other reasons than for misconduct or malfeasance in office.

This is the class of cases which the amendment is designed to reach, and I think its distinguished mover will not deny that the main object and purpose of the amendment is to declare that if the President makes removals from office for mere political reasons, and thus causes vacancies during the recess of the Senate, the persons he appoints to fill them shall receive no payment for their services in office until confirmed by the Senate. In such cases the real question is not on the power of the President to fill a vacancy, but as to his power to thus make a vacancy. This brings up the old question of the power of the President to remove from office persons to whose original appointment the advice and consent of the Senate was necessary.

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] with his usual straightforwardness and frankness, boldly avows that in his judgment the President's power of removal in such cases is commensurate only with his power of appointment; and that the consent of the Senate is as necessary to the removal as to the appointment. The able and learned argument of the Senator went far toward convincing me that if the question could now be considered an open one, that was the true construction of the Constitution.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] declared his willingness to support the amendment, except for the clause requiring the cause of removal to be reported to the Senate; but he admitted the power of the President under the Constitution to make removals without the consent of the Senate. In urging the necessity of the amendment, however, he dwelt wholly upon the abuse of the appointing power, by making appointments after the adjournment of the Senate, which might have been made and submitted to the Senate while in session. I should be doing that Senator great injustice to suppose that he did not fully understand that the matter aimed at was altogether a different and broader one. Other Senators have fought shy upon this question, and have argued in favor of the amendment, not exactly denying the power of removal, but under protestation, as a special pleader would say, that they do not admit it. They have said, conceding that he has the power of removal, we have the power to say whether his new appointees shall receive the salaries and compensations provided by law for those holding the offices. So we have the power to refuse any appropriations to pay the salary of the President, or to carry on any and every department of the Government, and thus destroy it. Although we may have such power, it is one which can only be justified in use in the last resort, to prevent usurpation or the destruction of the liberties of the people.

But if we believe that the President has not the legal and constitutional power of removal, why not say so directly? If we are prepared to adopt the doctrine of the Senator from Missouri, why not do it in as open and manly a way as he declares it? After a uniform exercise of the power by every Administration since the formation of the Constitution, to some extent, although for a considerable time doubted and questioned, and after at least thirty years of undoubted and unquestioned use, by a sweeping change of political appointments, with every political change of administration, and by both political parties, if we design now to declare a different rule, and change the whole action of the Government in this respect, does it behoove us to do it in the indirect and sinister way this amendment proposes?

I have asked if that was the design, to deny to the President the power to remove, why not declare so, and make the needful and proper legislation on the subject, and I have been told that we could not pass such a law. Why not, let me ask? It must be, I suppose, because a majority of this body, or of both Houses, do not believe in the principle. If that be so, is it exactly open and honest dealing to undertake to bolster up this amendment by affecting to believe the President transcends his power by making such removals and new appointments? I must be allowed to say that it is a mode of accomplishing a purpose that does not commend itself to me.

But notwithstanding the argument in support of the amendment has been mainly that such political changes were beyond the legal and constitutional power of the President, the amendment upon its face concedes it, and provides that those appointed to fill vacancies caused by removals for misconduct in office shall be excepted from this prohibition of payment. It cannot be said that he has the power of removal for one cause, and has not for another. If by the Constitution he has the power of removal at all, of necessity he must be the sole and exclusive judge of the cause and necessity of removal. The validity or legality of the appointment of the officer appointed to fill such a vacancy could not be inquired into by going back to inquire for what cause his predecessor was removed. In the exhaustive discussions which this subject received from the eminent statesmen of the early days of the Government, it was never suggested but that the President was the only judge of the cause of removal, if he possessed the power in any case. This amendment virtually branches a wholly new doctrine. It concedes the power of removal by the President, but assumes that we may go back behind that, and inquire into the reasons, for the purpose of determining whether the new appointee shall have pay. It is certainly an anomaly that a man may legally fill and perform the duties of an office, but his right to compensation shall depend upon the reasons that influenced the appointing power in making the appointment.

The last contest on this subject of the President's power of removal was during President Jackson's administration, and the great Whig leaders of that day made a powerful effort to bring the Government back to what they claimed was the true construction of the Constitution, and deny the President the power of removal. But they did not succeed, and all parties have acted without question since upon the other theory. But it seems not to have occurred to those eminent statesmen that though the President could legally remove officers and fill their places with other persons, that they could make it a barren honor by depriving the holders of all compensation. It has been reserved for this financial generation to discover this new mode of curing either a defect in the Constitution or a wrongful interpretation of it. To me, the idea is strange and monstrous that a man who legally holds an office, and properly performs its duties, should not be paid because the reasons for his appointment were politically unsatisfactory. I believe such a position to be wholly indefensible; wrong in principle; one upon which no party can stand. In offering the motion to reconsider the vote passing this bill, I happened to say that such a doctrine seemed to me to be almost revolutionary. I have since learned that a radical Unionist has no right to use that word, that it belongs wholly to persons and papers of opposite political proclivities. I therefore take leave to withdraw the word.

What is the real purpose and object of this amendment? I suppose we may as well speak of things as they exist and as we all know them to be, as to pretend to be thinking and talking of something else.

A difference has arisen between the President and the Congress in relation to the proper policy to be pursued in relation to the States lately in rebellion, who separated from us and formed themselves into a separate government, and between whom and us a fierce war raged for four years before we succeeded in conquering them. The President insists that, as the rebellion is put down and new State governments have been set up in those States, they are now entitled to be represented in the two Houses of Congress (if the members sent are loyal) and to participate in all respects in the administration of the General Government as if they had not rebelled. Congress, on the other hand, claim that all the legal relations between these States and the General Government having by the rebellion and war consequent upon it been severed, it rests with Congress as the law-making department of the Government to restore them again, and that, in doing so, it is their right and their duty to exact such assurances and guarantees as will protect the loyal part of the nation against all danger from those who have shown such a determination to destroy it.

Neither the President nor Congress as yet show any disposition to yield to the views and policy of the other, and apparently the question must be determined by an appeal to the people in the election of the next Congress.

The President, and the majority in both Houses of Congress, were elected by the same political party, the great Union party of the country, which carried us so gloriously through the great rebellion; and the Federal offices of the country are generally filled by members of the same party, who were appointed by the President, or his predecessor, Mr. Lincoln. I suppose it to be true that the great majority of those persons now holding office, as well as the great mass of the Union party, concur with Congress in the proper policy to be pursued in the restoration of these rebel States. I suppose it is feared that in this contest before the people, as to which of these respective policies shall prevail, the President will attempt to strengthen his position by the use of his patronage, that is, that he will displace men who believe in and advocate the congressional policy, and fill the positions with either Union men, or Democrats who will advocate the policy of the President. And I do not know but it is feared that men now holding office, who really believe with Congress, will, for fear of losing their offices, profess to believe and act with the President. Now, I have no knowledge that the President designs any such course of action; he may or may not. I do know that the Democratic press and politicians of the country are urging this course upon him with great zeal, and with great promise of political profit to him and his policy. I cannot help believing that they have their own profit and advantage much more at heart than his, or that of his policy, in giving this disinterested advice. Now, I should as deeply regret to have any good Union man removed from office, and especially one that fully sympathized with Congress in their difference with the President, as any Senator in this Chamber, or any Union man in the land. I like to have my political friends hold the offices, not only for their own advantage and profit, but because I am very apt to think they are the best men, and that the public service is more honestly attended to than it would be by men of the opposite political belief.

Now, if this amendment is adopted, will it have the effect to prevent the President from making changes in office for political causes? If he has no such purpose or intention, then there is certainly no need of such an extraordinary provision being attached to this bill. And I may be allowed to say that I am not prepared to believe that he designs to do any such foolish thing. But assuming that he has such a wish and purpose, will the adoption of such an amendment as this be likely to prevent him from accomplishing it? On the other hand, will it not look like daring and defying him to do it, and be very likely to produce the very result we desire to avoid? It is very reasonable to suppose that the President would feel great reluctance to remove men of his own party, appointed either by himself or his martyred predecessor, even if they did not believe in or advocate his policy. If we attempt to prevent it by the use of such questionable, if not unwarrantable legislation, as this amendment proposes, is there not danger, not only that he will accept the challenge, but that this very amendment will be accepted by the people as a sufficient justification for that course, and furnish a ground for saying that Congress was the aggressive party? Situated as we are, it seems to me that the adoption of this amendment will be more likely to produce than to prevent what we all hope to avoid.

But suppose that I am mistaken in my views, and in consequence of a failure to adopt this amendment the President undertakes to help his case before the people by turning good Union men who believe with Congress out of office, and fills their places with men, either Republicans or Democrats, who believe in his policy, is there any such ground of alarm in this as should frighten us out of our propriety, and drive us to doubtful and desperate expedients?

The whole thing is founded in a mistaken lack of faith in the people. This has been a common error of politicians and public men always, but the mistake is greater now than ever before, and especially in regarding any past experience of the effect and power of political patronage as applicable to the present condition of things.

In former times, when the people regarded politics merely as a trade by which certain men obtained a living; when the issues between the parties were about internal improvements, the public lands, banks, tariffs, and the like, subjects the real merits of which the masses of the people really knew but little about, and cared less; when they had no real belief that the success or defeat of either party would make a farthing's difference with them or the country, then a body of stirring, active office-holders, to circulate documents, harangue the people, and get out the voters, could produce a very important influence upon an election. But this state of things has no existence now, and no reliance can be placed now upon the experience of those days. For four long years we were engaged in a most desperate and bloody war, which periled the very existence of the nation itself. The attention of the whole country was roused and was kept most painfully intent upon the causes and course of the war till it ended in the overthrow of the rebellion. Almost every family throughout the loyal North was represented in the Army of the Union by some father or brother or son, and mourning and sorrow were carried into almost every northern home by the death of some dear relative in the Army by disease or on the battle-field, or the still more cruel mode of starvation in prison. In this way the people have come to comprehend everything pertaining to the subject as fully and completely as the first statesmen in the land. Nor have they, since the close of the war, lost any of their interest in it, and will not until the whole matter is put at rest.

I have heard it said here, I have read in the public press, that the great anxiety of the people was to have the matter settled, and get all the States once more into the Union together. The people are anxious to have the Union restored and all act again together, but that is not their great anxiety. What they fear, and about which they are earnestly anxious, is that they should not again be admitted until it is made perfectly certain that they are not again to come under southern domination, and that not even by combination with their old allies in the North can they again control the Government. The Union people of the North are not revengeful or malignant, but they cannot forget their martyred brothers and sons, or their own anxieties and sorrows; they cannot forget the immense burden of public debt imposed upon them; and they are too often reminded
